DEED—CONSTRUCTION—BONDS DRAWN FOR PAYMENT BUT UNPAID—INTEREST—PRIORITIES.—Railway contractors issued a public loan secured by mortgage of their railways, and concessions, in bonds bearing 7 per cent. interest, redeemable in ten years by semi-annual drawings, at each of which drawings at least 5 per cent. of the loan was to be paid off. By clause 15 of the mortgage deed the trustees were to apply the residue of the moneys come to their hands, first, in payment of arrears of interest actually due on outstanding bonds; secondly, in redemption of any such bonds as ought to have been redeemed at the previous drawing but were not so redeemed; and thirdly, in payment of future interest and future redemption of bonds. The plaintiff, the holder of bonds which had been drawn for payment, but were unpaid, sought to recover interest on the bonds from the time at which they were drawn for payment, until payment. Held, that he was not so entitled, and that he could not recover at law by an action on the bond under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28: (Gordillo v. Weguelin, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609. Chan. Div.)

WILL—REAL ESTATE—CLASS GIFT—LAPSE—TITLE.—A testator devised real estate to brother's children who should be living at his decease or who should have died leaving issue living at his decease as tenants in common. Four of the children of testator's brother survived testator, and one had died leaving issue living at testator's death. On a sale, it was objected by the purchaser that a good title could not be made to the whole of the property, as one undivided fifth part was either vested in the issue of the child who had died or had lapsed to the testator's heir-at-law, as under a partial intestacy: Held, following and approving Fell v. Biddolph (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 864; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 701), that this was a class gift; that the class to take were those who were capable of taking; that there was no lapse for the heir-at-law, but the four surviving children took the whole, and could give a good title to a purchaser: Remarks on Shaw v. MacMahon (4 Dr. & War. 481), and on Fell v. Biddolph (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 864; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 701): Coleman v. Jarrom, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 614. Ch. Div.)

CHARGING ORDER—JUDGMENT DEBTOR.—The liquidator of the B. Co. obtained a charging order on the 24th Oct. 1876, against C. on certain stock of the O. Co. standing in the name of C. The stock had been lent to C. by his father, merely to qualify him to be a director of the O. Co. On the 17th Oct. C. had retransferred the stock to his father, but the transfer was not registered till the 24th Oct. On the application for the charging order, notice was given to the liquidator that the stock belonged beneficially to the father. C. moved to discharge the order. Held, independently of the question of notice, that the stock was not standing in C.'s name in his own right, within 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14. Order discharged: (Re Blakely Ordnance Company (Coates's case), 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 617. Ch. Div.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—POWER—EXCLUSIVE OR NON-EXCLUSIVE POWER.—A testatrix after giving a life estate to a daughter in a certain fund, gave her a power to appoint the fund, "to and amongst (the testatrix's) other children or their issue in such parts, shares, and proportions, manner and form as her said daughter . . . should by deed or will appoint." Held, that this was an exclusive power and was well exercised by an appointment to one only of its objects to the exclusion of the rest: (Waite v. Robinson (2 Sim. 43) disapproved in Stolworthy v. Soncroft (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 262): Re Veale's Trusts, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612. Chan. Div.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PAROL PROMISE TO GIVE A HOUSE.—A., whose daughter was about to marry B., verbally promised them that he would give them a leasehold house as a wedding present for his daughter. A. had recently purchased the house, which was subject to a charge in favour of a building society. Immediately on the marriage B. and his wife entered into possession and remained there until A.'s death, they paying the ground rent, rates and taxes. No rent was ever demanded by A. A. died shortly afterwards intestate, at which time there was still 110l. owing to the building society. Held, that the entry into possession by B. and his wife was a part performance sufficient to take A.'s verbal promise out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds, and that B. and his wife were entitled to an assignment of the house and to have the balance due to the society paid out of the intestate's estate: (Ungley v. Ungley, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619. Chan. Div.)

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

LEEDS COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 21, 1876.

(Before W. T. S. DANIEL, Esq., Q.C., Judge.)

Re REAY HURST and G. E. HURST.

Liquidation—Partnership property—Disposition by one partner for private purposes—Bills of sale—Transactions with money lenders.

In this case some curious facts were elicited with reference to a young tradesman at Leeds and his money-borrowing dealings.

Bond made an application concerning certain goods which had been seized in the estate of the debtors. He applied that these goods should now be delivered up to the trustee as having been given by one partner without the knowledge of the other for private purposes; and also that certain bills of sale given by the younger of the two debtors upon the partnership property should not be sustained.

Pullan appeared for the respondents, George Payne (Manchester), George Noble (Leeds), George Morris (Leeds), and J. W. Bradbury (Leeds), money lenders.

Bond said his case was simply this—that the goods seized were joint property, and that the junior member of the firm, George Edward Hurst, had been foolish enough to give these bills of sale, or whatever other securities there were, over the property, which was joint property.

His HONOUR said that if there was a partnership it was well known that one partner could not pledge the goods of the partnership for his private debts.

George Noble was then called and examined. He said he was an agent in Leeds for different people who lend money. He had had dealings with the younger debtor, but only as an agent.

Pullan.—Really and truly Mr. Noble is only agent for a person named Payne, to whom the bill of sale was given by the younger debtor.

Noble.—I am agent for several other parties as well.

Pullan.—Mr. Noble never took security of any kind whatever himself.

His HONOUR.—You say you were agent for money lenders, among others George Payne, of Manchester?

Noble.—Yes.

Pullan.—And whatever dealings you have had with either of the Hursts has simply been as agent for Payne?

Noble.—Nothing of my own, nothing whatever. (Laughter.)

His HONOUR.—Tell me what your dealings were.

Noble.—Well, a young gentleman named George Edward Hurst came and applied to me to—

Pullan.—When was that?

Noble.—Can't remember.

His HONOUR.—You cannot remember the date of the bill of sale, and you an agent!

Pullan (handing the bill of sale to witness): Will you be able to tell when you refer to the bill of sale? Refresh your memory.

Noble (examining the bill).—This bears date Aug. 25th last; it would be a few days before when he applied to me. A friend of his made the first application, and then he called himself.

His HONOUR.—What was the amount?

Noble.—£32 10s., at 5 per cent. He signed the application papers, which I sent to Mr. Payne, who sent the money and that document, the bill of sale. I then sent for the young man to my place of business, to receive the money, sign the bill of sale, and that ended the whole transaction.

His HONOUR (referring to the bill of sale): But I see here that on the 25th Aug., the same date, Mr. George Payne writes a note—perhaps it is private and confidential—o this effect:—

SIR,—You are requested to observe that the bill of sale about to be signed by you makes the whole sum borrowed by you, or the balance thereof, immediately on demand, and notwithstanding a ment between us that the money should be instalments at any period. It is neither my is it my intention to take any unfair advantage power thus granted to me, but it is advisable should have special notice of the power on the document you are going to sign.—Recd of the above notice this 25th day of Aug. Signed, GEORGE EDWARD HURST. Witness Noble.

(Laughter.)

Pullan.—Well, your Honour, there is cealment about the matter there! All he "I let my money, and if people choose to or purchase it, they must pay my terms."

Bond.—And, of course, one would say more fools they." (Laughter.)

His HONOUR.—What? (Laughter.)

Noble (resuming his examination) said the first instance Hurst, jun., sent a young named Smithson to apply to him for his but he requested Smithson to send the bill himself.

Pullan.—Did you know the shop that occupied at that time.

Noble.—Very well; George Hurst's name over it.

Pullan.—Now, was there anything to in that it was a partnership concern?

Noble.—Nothing to my mind. In reply further questions, Noble stated that G. Edward Hurst went to see him about the Aug. He said that he had come to borrow money, and they had a talk about the sum after which he signed the usual application. The amount was £24 or £25. Witness him what business he was in, and where had the shop at the top of Briggate. I said that it was his shop; that nobody had control whatever over the goods in it, any deed of partnership, marriage settle or bill of sale. He also said that shop had been taken by his father upon a from the landlord. Witness said to him who made this statement, "Do you really that?" and he replied, "I was a witness signing of the deed by my father." He said that he wanted a lease of the shop himself the landlord refused to let him have it, and fore it was taken for him by his father. The plication which was then signed by him was forwarded to Manchester.

Bond asked for its production. Pullan said it was in Manchester. Whilst Bond and Pullan were conversing respecting notice having been served to produce documents bearing upon the case, Noble interposed with.—"I am sure Mr. I will not disown his own signature." (Laughter.) Continuing, Noble said that he forwarded with the application to Manchester a copy the valuation of the stock, &c., and in the of a few days the bill of sale and the cash down to hand over to Mr. Hurst.

Pullan.—What was the amount you agreed to lend him?

Noble.—£24 in cash, to be paid back at the of 25s. per week for twenty-six weeks.

That was the consideration you were to for the advance?

Noble.—If at the end of that time he repaid all, he would have to pay an add 5 per cent. so long as it remained unpaid. I paid ten weeks towards it.

His HONOUR.—I see that the bill of sale has been registered.

Pullan.—These bills of sale are never tered, your Honour; it might affect the case some. (Laughter.)

Noble.—We don't register them.

Pullan.—It is not customary for money to register them; they find an unregistered sale a much greater security than a registered one. (Laughter.)

In reply to further questions by Pullan, said he had never levied on the bill of sale went to the shop of the Hursts, and he closed and the goods removed. He then v Cromack and Burton's, auctioneers, and that a seizure had been made and the goods moved. As a matter of fact, this bill of sale never been put into execution.

Bond.—The young man Smithson who upon him in the first instance was connected an evening newspaper in Leeds. The elder had been in the shop on two or three occasions when he went to see the son about the of the instalments. He had often visited the

Bond.—On your oath, do you mean to say to us that the name over the door is not "J and Co.?"—It may be now, or it might be Bond.—It has never been changed; it is now.

His HONOUR.—Do you mean to state man of business such as you are, to whom man comes to borrow money, and who goes and values the goods for the purpose of lending, would not of course carefully name the name over the shop front?

de.—I did not do so; if I had the slightest about a man I would not advance him a penny. I have no risk; I don't lose a penny in HONOUR.—Are you not the agent of Payne, you not run a risk of losing something by tinging your duty?

de.—I think not. I have had no trouble in cases, and I have lent something like £5000 last five or six months.

d.—Now, what rate per cent. did you ask for the loan of this money?

de.—I did not ask him any rate per cent. as scholar, and could not calculate interest.

HONOUR.—Not a scholar, and cannot calculate interest!

de.—said that Noble was merely the agent in tter; his principal in Manchester fixed the d terms.

de.—repeated that, with all due deference to rt, he could not calculate the interest if he beraly paid for it. (Laughter.)

HONOUR.—"Where ignorance is bliss"—ter.)

de.—"Tis folly to be wise." (Great r.)

de.—I see you thoroughly know the quota-nd its application. (Laughter.)

de.—said that although he could not calculate t, he had done a bit of discounting for all nd had got as much as 150 per cent. for it. Id get much more for discounting bills than lls of sale.

de.—asked if the father ever saw his son pay the instalments?

de.—said he could not say. He had gone to p several times, and when the father was son would say to him, "You stop in a bit; just going out to have two pennyworth of (Laughter.) When he (Noble) found out romaok had got the goods, he went round other parties, and on inquiry he found that l of sale on behalf of Mr. Payne was before ber on the list, so he gave him notice to feet.

de.—Edward Hurst said he had been carry-business as a draper in Briggate since the b. last. The name over the shop was "J. and Co."

de.—Have you been in partnership with to participate in the profits of the busi-There have never been any profits to par-in. (Laughter.) His father had lent him bout £235 since he commenced business. l borrowed money from Noble, Newbound, and Co., and Bradbury and Co. In the Morris and Co., he actually borrowed the from Henry Cohen.

de.—explained, in answer to His Honour, rry Cohen carried on business as "Morris" de.—He then read a statutory declaration, he debtor (Hurst, jun.) had signed for a £25, and in which he stated that his es did not exceed £200, and his assets were value.

de.—asked witness if he did not sign this a commissioner.

de.—replied that he did—before Mr. Charles at. He could not say whether he was f he had read the declaration over before edit. (Laughter.)

de.—said his Honour would see that money were so often swindled by the public that are obliged in self defence to take extraor-precautions. (Laughter.)

HONOUR.—Well, I think they know pretty ow to look after themselves. I do not hey can be charged with neglect of duty. ter.) They are the curse of a commercial ; they induce false credit amongst trades-well as amongst others, cheating bona fide rs. You must not claim credit for them me Mr. Pullan.

de.—was afraid his Honour had a prejudice tipathy against money lenders.

HONOUR.—hoped not against the individuals; t the system, however, he undoubtedly had ipathy. Here they had a case of a person g documents without knowing their con-and in doing which, perhaps, he might rendered himself liable to be indicted for Y.

de.—an had no doubt that, if the commis-before whom the witness had made the ory declaration had been in court, he would old them that he read it over to him.

de.—witness said he had signed so many papers he commencement of his difficulties that he could not remember all of them.

HONOUR.—afterwards remarked that the young emed to swear to anything put before him. ally did not seem to know what the nature oath was except it was for something he wanted. He swore to affidavits the contents of which he did not seem to know, nor did he seem to think of the consequences; if he did, he apparently did not care.

Bond (to witness).—What did you do with the money you raised upon these bills of sale; did you use it for partnership purposes or purposes of your own? For purposes of my own.

Well, what did you do with it? Lost it in betting.

You gambled it away, that is the long and short of it, is it not? Yes.

His Honour said that if the witness was to be believed, there was no partnership. A jury might decide that, however. Mr. Bond must show that there was a partnership. The onus lay upon him to establish the fact. The evidence this young man had given in the witness-box had been such as might have subjected him to a double prosecution for perjury, and for which he might have been convicted and sentenced to seven years' penal servitude.

Pullan asked his Honour to dismiss the case with costs and discharge Mr. Noble. He and others had been dragged into court for something that they had never done, and he therefore thought they should be discharged from the proceedings.

His Honour asked how Cromack got possession?

Pullan replied, under a bill of sale given by Bradbury and Newbound.

Witness.—There was no money due to Newbound or Bradbury.

Pullan.—Either Newbound or Bradbury took possession under a bill of sale, and your Honour will find that neither Payne, Cohen, nor Morris had anything to do with the seizure.

His Honour thought that a jury would take a more practical view than he could. He had his own views upon the subject, which might be unjust.

After some further conversation, His Honour said that he had decided to direct an issue to be tried before a jury, whether the debtor at the date of the respective bills of sale, namely, the 25th and 26th Oct., and the 7th Nov. 1876, was in partnership with his father, and whether the goods mentioned in the bills of sale, purporting to be assigned thereby, were the goods of that partnership. He also directed that the goods which had been seized, and were now deteriorating in value, should be sold, and the proceeds brought into court.

On the application of Pullan, the motion against Noble was dismissed without costs.

(Before Mr. FALCONER, Judge.)

Re ESSERY; Ex parte HOLLAND.

Bankruptcy—Assignment of a contract without notice to the person being supplied under the contract with the goods.

C. H. Glascoine appeared for Holland; W. R. Smith for the trustees.

His Honour said:—William Holland, of Llanelly, in Carmarthenshire, an earthenware manufacturer, agreed with Mr. W. A. Essery for the sale to him of 30,000 fire bricks, at 72s. 6d. a thousand for Messrs. Henry Bath and Sons. They were to be delivered in a barge alongside a vessel at their wharf for shipment. The affidavit of Mr. Holland states that after he had an acceptance of the said W. A. Essery returned dishonoured, but before he was aware of his position he called his attention to the fact that he then owed to him a large sum of money, and he arranged with him that the sale should not be to him but to the said Messrs. Henry Bath and Son through him, and that he (Holland) should invoice the goods to them direct. The delivery was proceeded with on these terms, and an invoice was made out to present to Messrs. Bath as soon as the delivery should be complete. Messrs. Bath and Co. were not made aware of this arrangement, and have declined to acknowledge Holland in the matter. The necessity of giving notice of any such intended assignment of such a contract was established in the case of Cooke v. Hemming (L. Rep. 3, C. P. 334.) In that case one Read contracted to supply meat to an asylum. Being unable to carry out the contract, he assigned it to one Hemming, who delivered his own meat in Read's name. The asylum had no notice of the assignment, and were not aware that the contract was being performed by Hemming. Then the contract being put an end to by the asylum committee, and Read becoming bankrupt, the assignees of Read claimed the sum due for the meat as being "goods and chattels" in the order and disposition of Read at the time of his bankruptcy as reputed owner with the consent and permission of Hemming, the true owners within the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106). It was held by Bovill, C.J. Byles and Keating, JJ. that the debt passed to the assignees. The late Mr. Justice Willes, in a very able argument, contended that as the meat never had been in Read's possession, the debt which resulted from the supply to the asylum, although apparently by Read, was not a debt at the time of the bankruptcy with the consent of the true owner in the possession order or disposition of Read, but he was overruled. The facts of the case were similar to those now before me. The bricks Holland was to supply to Essery for Messrs. H. Bath and Sons it was agreed between Holland and Essery should be supplied to and invoiced to Messrs. Bath and Sons. Notice of this agreement was not given to Messrs. Bath and Sons. The consequence might have been that the debt might have passed to the trustee of the estate of Essery. In giving judgment in the case cited, the Court of Common Pleas dwelt on the necessity of giving notice to debtors on the assignment of debts due from them to creditors, and numerous cases are cited by Griffiths and Holmes and Archbold's Bankruptcy, 455, to this effect. Goods and chattels include debts (L.R. 3, C.P. 343), and it was asked, "how is a true owner to prevent reputed ownership otherwise than by notice to the person who is under liability in respect of the chattel?" The cases, also, on the importance of giving notice to the debtor on the assignment of the debt due from him are also those: Dean v. James (1 Add. & Ell. 807); and Jeffs v. Day (L. R. 1 Q. B. 372), when the defendant pleaded that he had assigned the debt to D. and Co., who gave notice, and that the assignment was in force, and it was held the plea was good. Willes, J., in the case cited, contended that we should consider those were the goods in respect of which the claim was made, and he spoke with much urgency when he said that if the assignee succeeded, the proceeds of Hemming's goods (the meat directly supplied to the asylum) would be confiscated to pay Read's creditors, though Read never had the meat. The second point in the case before me is that the bricks were delivered to Messrs. H. Bath and Sons, on Friday, 21st July 1876, and Saturday, 22nd July, and that the delivery commenced at eleven o'clock on the 21st July. In the joint affidavit of David Lewis and John Lewis, of the Primrose Coal Wharf, Swansea, they say that this wharf, in the month of July, was occupied by W. T. Holland, of the Ynismudw Works, and that they take charge of his goods when brought down by barge into the canal; and they remember the arrival of six barges from Ynismudw to Swansea on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd July. Two arrived on the evening of Thursday, the 20th, and they took possession of them, and they remained in the canal that night. On the morning of Friday, the 21st July, they took the barges through the Harbour Trust Lock from the canal and into the North Dock about ten o'clock a.m., and took them to the premises of Messrs. Bath. They were taken by T. Pountner, the foreman, for discharge, who took possession of them for Messrs. Bath about eleven o'clock on the morning of 21st July. The next two barges came down the same day, and were handed over to Messrs. Bath between two and three o'clock in the afternoon. The petition of the liquidator-debtor seems to have been filed between ten and eleven o'clock of 21st July. Holland also says that he saw W. A. Essery on Friday, 21st July, at about twelve o'clock a.m., but he did not say that he had filed his petition. After the bankruptcy the delivery of the bricks appears to have been made; that is, after the filing of the petition. The receiver claims £102 0s. 6d. on account of the bricks. If the argument of Willes, J., on the general question prevailed, Holland would be entitled on his general claim; but in that case [page 342] the majority of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas said: "Until bankruptcy the officers of the asylum had no notice or knowledge that the defendant, Hemming [who supplied the meat], was entitled to the money which would become payable under the contract to Read, or that Read was not entitled to it on his own account. There had been a further supply of meat by the defendant Hemming, after the bankruptcy; but the court said the claim in respect of that part of the supply was very properly given up by the assignee, leaving only the sum in dispute." In this case the delivery of the bricks has been since the bankruptcy, and, therefore, it would seem that it is very proper the claim made in respect of them by the trustee should be given up. On this authority I sustain the claim made by Holland for payment to him on account of the bricks.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND). (a)

Nov. 24 and Dec. 1, 1876.

(Before MILLER, J.)

Ex parte WARD, re WARD.

Act of bankruptcy—Beginning to keep house—Intending to delay creditors—Evidence—Denial to creditor—Trader's dwelling house closed by act of landlord distraining for rent—35 & 36 Vict. c. 58, s. 21. sub-s. 3.

On the 9th Nov. the shop of a trader was closed by his landlord when distraining for rent, but the tenant continued to reside on the premises. Subsequently, a person employed by a creditor went to the house to demand payment of a debt due to his employer by the trader, and saw Byrne, the trader's shop assistant, by whom the trader was denied to him, although then at home. On another occasion, a clerk employed by the creditor's solicitor went for the purpose of serving the trader with particulars of the demand, and the trader was, in like manner, denied to him by Byrne, to whom the particulars were then given and by whom they were afterwards delivered to the trader. On Nov. 13th following, the trader was again denied by Byrne to the person so employed by the creditor, although the trader was then at his dwelling-house. On the 14th he was denied in like manner to the solicitor's clerk, but afterwards, on the same day, went to the creditor's solicitor for the purpose of settling the demand; meantime, however, he had been adjudged bankrupt. On cause being shown against the adjudication, disputing the commission of an act of bankruptcy, Byrne was not produced for examination, nor was it established that there had been any physical obstacle to prevent the trader's attending a personal interview when sought, or any adequate cause to account for his having been denied:

Held, that the trader's acts unexplained, Byrne not having been produced as a witness, necessarily led to the intendment that the trader had begun to keep house with intent to defeat and delay his creditor—the fact of his going to the solicitor's office being insufficient to negative the existence of such intent—and that he had thereby committed an act of bankruptcy within the Bankruptcy Act (Ireland) Amendment Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 38), s. 21, sub-s. 3.

Cause shown against adjudication. The facts appear from the judgment of the court.

Monroe, for the bankrupt, showing cause.

Carton, for the petitioning creditor, contra, cited Ex parte Austin (2 Dea. 533); re Downing 26 L. T. Rep. 187).

Judgment reserved.

MILLER, J.—I reserved judgment on the present motion as the principles with which I was called upon to deal must have a very wide application. The primary obligation of a trader is to be present at all reasonable times at his dwelling-house to answer his liabilities to his creditors, or, if absent from his dwelling-house, to make adequate provision for meeting any such liabilities or claims that may be made during such his absence; and accordingly, the bankruptcy code provides, as a protection for any trader who observes such obligations, that he shall be fully informed as to the particulars of the claims and demands which may be made by his creditors at his dwelling-house, and a specified time for such trader either paying, compounding, or securing to any of his creditors such portions of any such demands as may be thus made upon him in respect of which he may admit his liability; but, on the other hand, if a trader owing debts, with intent to defeat and delay his creditors, evades such his primary obligation, and had, as applicable to the facts of this case, in the language of the 3rd sub-section of the 21st section of the Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Act 1872, "begun to keep house," that trader commits a clear act of bankruptcy, and deprives himself of such protection. On the 8th or 9th Nov. a person named Smith, in the employment of a man named Malone, who was at the time an undisputed creditor of Ward, the alleged bankrupt, called at the dwelling-house of Ward, in Barrack-street, in this city, where he had carried on the business of a grocer for a number of years, and, upon that occasion, had a personal interview with Ward, who was at the time in his bed, and a conversation with him relative to the settlement of the debt owing by Ward to his employer, Malone, although he, Smith, did not on that occasion make a special demand on behalf of his employer for payment of that debt. Afterwards, on the same 9th Nov., a law messenger named Kelly, on behalf of the landlord of Ward, laid on a distress for rent at the dwelling-house of Ward, and, on that occasion, took the strong step of closing up the shop of Ward, and Kelly stated as his reason for the course which he then adopted, that he ascertained that a portion of the goods of Ward had been removed out of his house to avoid an execution which he, Kelly, thereby caused to be restored. On the 10th Nov. (the next day) Smith, the assistant of Malone, again went to the dwelling-house of Ward, as he stated, for the express purpose of demanding from Ward payment of the debt owing by Ward to Malone, his employer. It has been incontrovertibly established, not alone by the evidence of Kelly who laid on the distress, but by the admissions of Ward himself, that he, Ward, was, on the 10th Nov., at home in his dwelling-house when Smith, on behalf of his employer Malone, called for the purpose as above stated; and no sur-offered to me of the existence of any physical obstacle in the way of Smith, on the part of his employer, obtaining upon that occasion an interview with Ward, at all events of such a nature as he had obtained on the day or day but one next proceeding. Upon the application at the closed dwelling-house of Ward by Smith, on behalf of his employer, upon that 10th Nov., Ward did not appear, but the door of his dwelling-house was then opened by a person named Byrne, who had been employed by Ward as his assistant in carrying on his trade. Smyth upon that occasion demanded from Byrne an interview with Ward, in reply to which Byrne stated that Ward had left the house and gone into lodgings. Smith then asked Byrne whether Ward had left provision with him (Byrne) for the payment of the debt owing by Ward to Malone, and demanded from Byrne payment of that debt; and Byrne, upon that occasion, stated that he (Ward) had not left with him any provision for the payment of the debt owing by him to Malone. On the 11th Nov. a clerk in the employment of the solicitor of Malone likewise went to the dwelling-house of Ward, for the purpose of serving Ward with the formal particulars of Malone's demand, and made a similar demand for an interview with Ward on that occasion, and could succeed alone in obtaining an interview with Byrne, the same assistant of Ward, and with a like result as Smith, the assistant of Malone, had experienced on the preceding 10th Nov.; and that clerk then gave the particulars of the demand of Malone to that same Byrne, which particulars the bankrupt himself admitted he had received. On the 13th Nov. following, Smith, the assistant of Malone, made a similar application for a similar purpose as on the 10th Nov., for an interview with Ward at his dwelling-house, in which he (Ward) then was upon his own admissions and the evidence of Kelly, the bailiff; and again, upon that occasion, Smith failed in obtaining any interview with Ward, and the same assistant, Byrne, again made to Smith similar statements to those which he had already made to Smith on the previous 10th of Nov., in reply to similar applications on his part. The clerk of the attorney of Malone again went, on Malone's behalf, to the dwelling-house of Ward on the morning of the 14th, and sought for an interview with Ward, with like results as before; and at a later portion of that 14th of Nov., Ward was adjudged a bankrupt on the application of Malone. The only circumstances which give a colour to the present application by Ward, for setting aside the adjudication as thus pronounced, were the facts as disclosed—namely, that the shop of Ward had been involuntarily closed by the agent of the landlord before any of such interviews were sought with Ward, either by Smith, the assistant of Malone, or by the clerk of the attorney of Malone; and further, as negating any intent on the part of Ward to defeat and delay his creditors, that he (Ward), on that same 14th of Nov., on which he was adjudicated a bankrupt, went voluntarily to the office of the solicitor of Malone, his creditor, and that it was shortly after leaving that office he (Ward) was, for the first time, served with the order for adjudication. As to the first of such facts, it is sufficient to state that the closing of the shop of Ward did not impose any restriction upon his personal liberty, or prevent him, if within his dwelling-house, from meeting any creditor who called at his house if he (Ward) was inclined to meet him, and would not, of itself, account either for the non-appearance or denial of Ward to any of his creditors who called; and that, as regards the latter fact of Ward having gone on the 14th to the office of the solicitor of Malone, upon evidence such as I have sketched, it has been very plainly established that Ward, while in his dwelling-house, was, by his authority, denied to a creditor when he should have presented himself—or, in the language of the 3rd sub-section referred to, had begun to keep house from and subsequent to the 10th Nov.—and that such acts unexplained led to the inevitable inference that he (Ward) did such acts with the intent to defeat and delay his creditor Malone; and that act of Ward in going to the office of the solicitor of Malone on the 14th Nov. admits of either of two explanations—namely, that he (Ward) went there in entire ignorance of the legal consequences of his previous acts, or, that he had been advised in the meantime as to the effect of such his previous acts of thus denying himself to Malone, and adopted that mode of obviating the force of the evidence arising from those acts. But, as Byrne, the assistant of Ward in his business, who appeared at the dwelling-house of Ward on each of the occasions of the interviews there of the 10th, 11th, 13th, and 14th, has not been produced for examination, it is sufficient to state that no construction can be put upon the act of Ward other than their necessary intendment, namely, that he had begun to keep house with the intent to defeat and delay his creditor; and the cause as shown must, therefore, be disallowed with costs. Cause shown disallowed.

CROYDON COUNTY COURT.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

BATCHELOR v. KEITH.

Secondary evidence of unstamped agreement to a lease purposely destroyed by defendant cannot be given in an action for rent, but may be given in an action of trespass for the destruction of the document or for specific performance in equity.

Frith for plaintiff.

Parry for defendant.

His HONOUR.—In this case some difficult points as to the admission of evidence and of common law and equity have arisen, as also a serious conflict of testimony. The plaintiff, who is a builder, and the defendant and his wife, in or about May last, entered into a negotiation for the letting, for three years, of a house newly erected by the plaintiff. In the course of such negotiation the defendant's wife asked the plaintiff whether they might continue in occupation if they felt disposed after the three years had expired, and he told her that they might, and that he would give them a note to that effect. The defendant, however, said nothing about it. The plaintiff furnished the defendant with a lithographed form of letting, and said that there would be some trifling additions which he would make to it. On the 11th May last the defendant called by appointment, with his wife, on the plaintiff, who produced a similar lithographed form, signed by the plaintiff, and in which the blanks were filled up, being an agreement for the letting of the premises by the plaintiff to the defendant, for three years from the 24th June then next, at £28 a year payable quarterly. There was a trifling addition in it as to fixtures, and an additional clause enabling the lessor to enter at reasonable times for the purpose of repairing and cleaning the water pipes and cistern, and prohibiting the defendant from using the water otherwise than for domestic purposes. The plaintiff deposes that he read the whole document to the defendant. The defendant and his wife depose that he only read a few words of it and explained the rest, but that he drew attention to the clause at the end of it as to the water pipes and cistern. The evidence of the defendant and his wife was somewhat contradictory as to these details. The plaintiff and defendant are agreed that at the conclusion of the interview, the defendant signed the agreement in the presence of the plaintiff's daughter who attested her signature, but was not present previously, and therefore could not depose as to what had passed. The plaintiff handed the agreement to the defendant as soon as he had signed it, together with another form for him to fill up as a copy or counterpart, and requested him to return the former in two or three days. The defendant took them home, and two days afterwards called on the plaintiff and said "that he would not be bound by the agreement," and, as he deposes, gave two reasons for the same—firstly, that the agreement did not contain a provision for a further lease; and secondly, that it contained the power of entry to repair the water pipes. The plaintiff, however, deposes that the defendant only made the latter objection, and the plaintiff's evidence is confirmed by a subsequent letter from the defendant to him, dated the 18th May, in which the defendant makes the latter objection only. The defendant further alleges that he regarded the agreement only as a draft, or, in his own words, "as a preliminary affair," which appears to me to be quite at variance with all the facts in the case. Shortly after the defendant's interview with the plaintiff, the defendant purposely destroyed the agreement, which was unstamped, but apparently within the fourteen days allowed for stamping agreements. Subsequently the plaintiff put the house in complete order, and on the 12th June wrote to the defendant that he could enter on the 24th June, but the defendant has never entered. The plaintiff now sues the defendant for £8 10s., one quarter's rent alleged to have become due on the 29th Sept. last. The first question is as to the admissibility of secondary evidence of the contents of the unstamped agreement which was destroyed by the defendant, and I regret to say that although it is an evident hardship that the defendant should be able to take advantage of his own wrong, the case of Rippiner v. Wright (21 B. & A. 478) is a direct authority that such evidence is not admissible in the present action, which is for rent, or rather for a sum of money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff in the nature of rent under the agreement in question. I, however, think that in an action for trespass for the wilful destruction of this agreement by the defendant secondary evidence of its contents might be given, and that the amount now sued for could be recovered as damages in such an action. And I feel no doubt that such evidence would be admissible in equity upon a claim that the defendant should be decreed to sign another agreement in place of the one which he fraudulently destroyed, or to execute a lease in conformity therewith, and to pay the amount now claimed. It has long ago been said that the Statute of Frauds "was intended to create or protect fraud (Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers), and the same may certainly be said of the Stamp Act. I also think, but with some doubt, that this court has jurisdiction in equity to grant relief in the present case, under the County Court Acts 1865 and 1867. Being of opinion, on the merits of the case, that the defendant undoubtedly signed the agreement in question with a full knowledge of its contents, and subsequently endeavoured to free himself from it by subterfuge and fraud, I shall, if the plaintiff desire it, give him liberty to amend by inserting a count for trespass, and a claim in equity, as I have suggested, or either of them, and adjourn the further hearing of the case to next court, when it may be re-argued, if necessary; and otherwise I shall direct a nonsuit, with liberty to the plaintiff to appeal in the usual manner, or to bring another action.

The plaintiff's counsel elected to have the case adjourned, with liberty to amend.

Adjourned accordingly.

STONEHOUSE COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, Nov. 14, 1876.

(Before M. FORTESCUE, Esq., Judge.)

WILSON v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carrier—Railway train—Punctuality—Breach of contract.

MISS ELIZA WILSON, of Prospect-street, Plymouth, sued the company to recover £1 8s., expended by her in consequence of the delay of a train, timed to reach Swindon at 4.10 p.m., not arriving there until 7 p.m., by reason of which the plaintiff had to post to Challow.

E. G. Bennett represented the defendants.

Miss Wilson conducted her own case. She stated that on the 4th Sept. she wished to book by the 10.40 a.m. train from Mutley Station to Challow, in Berkshire, but the stationmaster told her that he could not book her to that station. She asked for one to Swindon, but the stationmaster said he could book her only to Bath. He pointed out, by the company's time-tables, her route, showing that she would arrive at Bath at 3.17 p.m., at Swindon at 4.10 p.m., and get to Challow by a slow train at 5.45 giving her a margin of an hour and a half should the train be late. But the train she left Plymouth in was more than three hours late in arriving at Bath. She went on to Swindon; and, as she was bound to be in Challow that day, was compelled to post a distance of sixteen miles, for which she claimed the cost, £1 8s.

Cross-examined: Asked at Mutley for a third class through ticket to Challow, and the stationmaster said that he could not book her there. He did not say he could not book her third class there; she did not think he could have booked her by any other class. He said he could book her to Bath. She took a ticket for that place, and being three hours late on arrival was too late to get to Challow by the slow train. She booked on to Swindon, from which Challow was two stations further on. Q. Do you know why you were so late?—We were simply delayed the whole time. There was no apparent cause; we were going slowly and stopping at different places. Did not know nor hear why they were so stopping; knew of no accident to her train or to one before it.

Bennett said a train conveying sailor boys had broken down in front of the express, and the express had to take it on.

His HONOUR: That would not be an excuse; they ought to put on a special train for the sailor boys.

Bennett said the boys were being conveyed by a special, and the engine having broken down the express had to take it on. He submitted that that was not a case to be tried in the Plymouth jurisdiction; it should be heard in Bath or London, as the second ticket was obtained at Bath.

His HONOUR held that the contract to carry the contract to carry the plaintiff having been made in his jurisdiction he could try the case.

Bennett said plaintiff had not proved any case; she had not put in any contract.

His HONOUR said she could not, as the only evidence of contract she had was the ticket which had been given up, and which, no doubt, she ought to have given the company notice to produce. He would adjourn the case to enable her to do that, but without putting her to any cost for the adjournment.

Bennett did not desire to take advantage of a technicality if his Honour thought it a fair case to be tried at Plymouth.

The Registrar.—You cannot help its being tried here.

His HONOUR.—Perhaps it will be much better to have it tried here than where the Great Western offices are, because the judge of that district has found the Great Western Company responsible in almost every case similar to this which he has tried. (Laughter.)

Bennett said the train by which the plaintiff travelled was four hours late at Swindon, and he quoted from the time tables to show that the company expressly provided that they did not guarantee the times of departure and arrival so advertised, nor would they be accountable for any loss, inconvenience, or injury which might arise from loss or detention unless upon proof that such loss, inconvenience, injury, delay, or detention arose in consequence of the wilful misconduct of the company's servants. On the 4th Sept. the 10.35 express was ten minutes late at starting, because of a breakdown on the Cornwall line of the special sailor boys' train, which delayed the ordinary up Cornish train in connection with the 10.35. The sailor boys were despatched from Plymouth in front of the express, and the engine of their train—the Penwith—broke down half a mile from Ivybridge, the rod of the safety valve breaking, by which all steam was lost, and the engine useless. The 10.35 was stopped at Hemerdon, had to go on slowly to the scene of the breakdown, and pushed the sailors' train to Ivybridge. There the two trains were made up together, and went on, the express being then forty-one minutes late, and, as was always the case, the delay at starting increased on the journey, and in the end the train was four hours late at Paddington. The accident was entirely beyond the company's control; it was entirely unforeseen and unavoidable, and therefore he submitted that the verdict must be for the defendants. To uphold this view he quoted from the case of Le Blanche v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 667; 45 L. J. 521, C. P.). In that case the plaintiff booked from Liverpool to Scarborough, and, being delayed, took a special train, for the cost of which, £11 10s., he sued the defendants. He had a verdict in the County Court and in the court above, but the Court of Appeal held that unless the damages were reduced to 1s. there would be an order for a new trial. Nothing more was heard of that case. In the present instance he contended that the accident was unavoidable, that the defendants could have done nothing to ward it off, and that there was no want of care on their part—in fact, to use the words of Lord Justice James in the case he had referred to, there was no wilful delay and no careless loitering which would entitle plaintiff to recover.

William Henry Ellis, engine driver of the Penwith, stated that all went well until they got within half a mile of Ivybridge, when the arm of the spring balance of the safety valve broke, and the engine was disabled. The engine was perfect in the morning when he inspected it, and the part which broke was entirely exposed to view. Such an arm would last for twenty years without wearing out.

Plaintiff pointed out that the accident was not to the engine of the train she had booked to go by.

His HONOUR.—But you would not have liked to run into the disabled train would you?

Plaintiff.—No; but as we were so near Plymouth when the accident happened, ought they not to have had another engine for the sailor boys' train, and not attached it to ours?

Bennett said there were two engines on to the express, and the steam power was quite enough to draw the two trains together.

Thomas Bryant, travelling porter, gave evidence respecting the breaking down of the Penwith, and his going to Cornwall to stop the express, and having the other train pushed into Ivybridge, and then coupled up and taken on.

William Storey, foreman of the engine department, Plymouth, said the Penwith was in good working order on the 4th Sept.

His HONOUR said it seemed to him that the company should have provided sufficient haulage.

Bennett would be able to show that there was sufficient haulage; but the delay which occurred at one end gradually increased, thus making the train so late at the close of the journey.

John Felix Gerrey, booking constable at Mutley, deposed that when plaintiff asked for a ticket for Challow by the 10.40 express, he pointed out note F on the time bills, which showed that the train did not stop there. He gave her a third class ticket to Bath, where the express should have arrived at 3.17 p.m., telling her the best plan was to go to Challow by the slow train which left Bristol at 3.30 p.m. and Bath at 4.13 p.m., getting to Challow at 6.5

Thomas Jones, head guard of the Flying Dutchman, said his train drawn by two powerful engines, Tiger and Gabelle, left Plymouth on the 4th Sept. ten minutes late, namely, at 10.45 p.m. All went well until the top of Hemerdon was reached, when the train was stopped for seven minutes; then it went on to the break down, pushed the broken down train into Ivybridge, and then coupled it up and took it on, being forty-one minutes late at starting. There were three carriages to the sailor boys' train and seven on his—in all ten. He had plenty of steam power for the South Devon inclines, and more than was needed for level roads. Had no more than the average number of carriages to his train. The plaintiff's train was practically lost at Ivybridge, because, being forty-one minutes late, the express, due at Bristol at 3 p.m., would not necessarily be there until after the slow train which would have taken her to Challow, and which left at 3.30 p.m., would have started. At Exeter the express was thirty-seven minutes late, having made up four minutes. At Taunton, which was reached at 2.25 p.m., a detention was caused by the breaking of a spring of a second class carriage, and this had to be taken off. The train was an hour and seven minutes late on leaving Taunton, and, having a slow train in front, they did not reach Bristol until 5.22, two hours and twenty-two minutes late. Left Bristol at 5.34, and arrived at Bath at 6.34 p.m. instead of at 3.17 p.m. A delay at the country end of the line tells with increasing ratio as the train nears London, in consequence of the accumulating traffic. In reply to his Honour, witness said that even if the carriage spring had not broken at Taunton, he feared that the plaintiff would not have saved the slow train from Bristol for Challow. Sufficient time had been lost at Ivybridge to prevent her doing so.

John D. Parr, assistant traffic superintendent of the western division of the Great Western Railway, said the express of the 4th of September had ample engine power to draw that and the sailor boys' train to Newton. Beyond that there was not a load for one engine.

His HONOUR, in giving judgment, regretted that plaintiff had not obtained the assistance of a legal adviser, who would, no doubt, have ascertained the cause for the delay, or she might have found this out for herself by asking fellow passengers. There was always increasing delay to an already late train on getting towards London, by reason of trains running from branch lines and slow trains on the same line started at proper times, although other trains were late. An instance of this kind had occurred to himself, a train that he was in being delayed once for four hours, in consequence of half an hour's breakdown. From the unforeseen break down of the sailor boys' train, the express was forty-one minutes late on leaving Ivybridge, and from that time the guard said plaintiff's slow train for Challow was lost. The delay at Taunton did not in any way affect it. The delay seemed to have arisen by an unavoidable accident to the engine of the sailor boys' train, and not by carelessness or negligence. Therefore the verdict must be for the defendants, but of course Mr. Bennett did not ask for costs.

Bennett said he applied for only such costs as the company had been put to by bringing witnesses from a distance, and no travelling expenses.

His HONOUR allowed this, and expressed it as his opinion that the action had very properly been defended.

The case, which lasted some hours, was then concluded.

WALTHAM ABBEY COUNTY COURT.

(Before J. T. ABDEY, Esq., Judge.)

SMEY v. WOOD.

Pound breach—Liability of owner of chattels found afterwards in his possession to treble damages under 2 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 5.

Masterman (instructed by Metcalf, of Epping), appeared for the plaintiff.

Eagles (Evans and Eagles), for the defendant.

The action was brought under the above-mentioned statute to recover treble damages, which the plaintiff estimated at £87 15s. (less £37 15s., part whereof which he abandoned), for the wrong sustained by him by reason of the pound breach and rescous on or about the 8th Nov., of three heifers and four calves, which had been on the 3rd of that month on certain land in the parish of Theydon Garnon, lawfully seized and detained for £25 5s., being one-half year's rent reserved and due to the plaintiff on the 29th Sept. 1876 (and still unpaid), on a lease of the said land to Richard Laxton, and had been afterwards on the same day lawfully impounded in land of the plaintiff in the said parish, and which cattle were afterwards, to wit, on the 8th Nov., and on divers days between that day and the date of the summons, found to have come to the use and possession of the defendant, the owner thereof.

Evidence was adduced in support of these facts.

His HONOUR held (overruling several objections taken by the defendant's solicitor) that the ownership of the land by the plaintiff was necessary, rent having been paid under the lease that a due distress had been proved; that notice of distress was only material when the goods are sold under a distress; and that a pound was a proper pound for cattle, and that in the case the land in question was a proper pound. After the defendant had given evidence to the effect that the cattle had been in the adjoining land held by him of Mr. Laxton, and that he did not know how they had got into the land held by Mr. Laxton of the plaintiff, his Honour, without calling on the plaintiff's counsel to reply, gave verdict for the plaintiff for £250, the sum of the treble damages less the part abandoned, costs of suit.

LEGAL NEWS.

UNDER the heading "Commissions" the following appeared in the Times, written by a firm of auctioneers:—The five letters on this subject, impressions of the 26th, 28th, and 29th inst., all been anonymous. We will ask you to insert a few lines from us in our own names. First, is no doubt that the vast majority of auctioneers, accountants, and official liquidators demand, right and custom, a share of the commission the auctioneer to whom they intrust the sale of the properties they have to deal with, in their professional capacities; secondly, there is no doubt that almost every auctioneer in London—either with or without some gall form of protest—is content to pay them a share of the commission for the introduction of business. We old enough to remember the brave stand made by the late Mr. Alexander Rainey some thirty years ago, when certain lawyers started this against him. Mr. Rainey protested, and resisted it. His name as an auctioneer and valuer fell off, and he died, recently, in poverty. Since then, such has been made by the Society of Auctioneers, others to check the evil, but these have been feeble and not always sincere, and no real corps has been established. "Competition" is the order of the day. New firms, wise in their generation, make large displays of sales, through readiness to fall in with the views of these professional men who demand their quid pro quo. Especially is this the case in regard to bank business; and it was only last week that we consulted on the expediency of suing a few auctioneers for some few hundred pounds' proceeds of a chattel sale eight months ago, and should have been paid over a fortnight after auction. The late Sir Robert Peel brought auctioneers' licence down to £10, and then induced all but "free trade" into a business more than most others should be protected from charlatanism and lack of pecuniary resources is common enough to meet with solicitors' bemoan the small amount their "charges" to in comparison with the percentage of the auctioneers. They then seek, as a supplement to part of the auctioneer's commission, and in cases they obtain it—indeed, the principle "nothing for nothing" runs through almost every branch of our complicated industrial life, and scarcely be otherwise at present. "What do you make me?" is probably the second question asked by most of the B.'s when they take business to the A.'s. "We are but mortal," the quaint but significant expression of the accountants to our representative a few days ago, and we could name name instances well these. Before the days of liquidation, creditors elected two of their own number the trade assignees of a bankrupt's estate; official assignees were appointed by the court, there was little or none of this modern objectionable practice. Each matter was placed in the hands of the man best fitted to perform the duty, and a fair scale of costs was fixed by the Bankruptcy Court both for the trade assignees and the official assignees. Now, the solicitors and auctioneers do as they like, and the auctioneers either "arrange" with them, or see the land drift elsewhere, while he is vainly lamenting "the client suffers," and that an incompetent perhaps, dishonest rival is employed. In regard ordinary auction sales, owners of property of whatever kind will find advantage in making all proper inquiries themselves, and personally calling on the firm they select arranging terms with the principal. We think that all our leading auctioneers would make this direct and simple course to the profit "haggling" with third parties, whose only object is to gain, in an underhand way, money they have no legal or moral title. We would add that our English Bar is protected from these encroachments on their fees, first, by a high standard of honour among their members, and then by the rules of the House of Court.

THE REGISTRARSHIP OF THE SOUTHAMPTON CITY COURT.—Mr. H. J. Walker, who succeeded the late Mr. A. S. Thorndike as registrar of the Southampton County Court district, having secured the appointment of registrar of the Chester Registry of the High Court of Justice. Mr. John Daw, of Tiverton, Devon, at present acts as Deputy-Registrar at Southampton, will probably be appointed to the post of Registrar.

ANNUAL CERTIFICATE DUTY.—The following is an old copy of Punch, dated 1851: "It has been decided by a majority of nineteen in the House of Commons that a Bill is to be introduced making off the duty on attorneys' certificates. These instruments may be regarded as authentic the pursuit of game, we may expect the common man to attempt to avail himself of its provisions. The attorneys have often been likened to dogs of the law, though they by no means deserve the wholesale application of the title, and now, in reference to their hunting after game, 'Old Harry-ers' would be a good name for a dog. Tempora mutantur, but not the duty on attorneys' certificates."

THE LAW OF MURDER.—Sir Eardley Wilmot, M.P., who is spending the winter at Nice, in the south of France, has written to Mr. Talbot, secretary of the Howard Association, London, informing him that it is his intention in the next session of Parliament to introduce a short Bill to restrict the capital penalty to cases of murder where the jury find that actual premeditation of the crime existed. Sir E. Wilmot's action in respect is without prejudice to Mr. J. W. Pease's intended motion for the total abolition of all punishment. Both gentlemen are members of the Howard Association, the object of which is the promotion of the best methods of the treatment and prevention of crime; but Sir E. Wilmot, like Mr. Pease, advocates the total abolition of the death-penalty, although he considers existing law of murder to be fraught with mistakes and gross irregularities.

THE LAW OF EXCHANGE.—Among the signs of depression of trade is a diminished number of bills required by the public for bills of exchange. In the financial year 1873-74 the number was 359, producing a revenue of £999,604, or 10 millions of bills, supplying nearly a million of revenue. In the next year, 1874-75, the number fell to 9,809,899, and the revenue to £809. In the year 1875-76 the number was 7,355,566, and the tax £869,131; the number is decreasing by a quarter of a million in the space of two years, but the revenue not declining much. Still, the number of bills is much above what it was ten years ago, when (in the year 1865-66) there were but 8,375,893 bill stamps issued.

The following members of the legal profession died during the year:—The Right Hon. Sir Taylor Coleridge; Mr. Justice Keatinge, Judge of the Irish Court of Probate; Lord Justice Whiteside; Lord Neaves, Mr. Quain, Lord Ardmillan (a Scottish Judge in session); Sir Thomas Henry, Chief Magistrate at Bow-street Police-court; Mr. Justice Bald; ex-Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, James Reid, formerly Chief Justice in the Islands; Sir Richard Hanson, late Chief Justice of South Australia; Mr. John B. Parry, Judge of the Oxfordshire County Courts; John H. Barker, late police magistrate at Ennwell; Mr. S. Joyce, Q.C.; Mr. T. J. Hall, Chief Metropolitan Magistrate; Mr. Rick Cole, Q.C.; the Right Hon. Sir James Hogg, formerly Registrar of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta; the Right Hon. Frederick Shaw, late Recorder of Dublin; Mr. J. Gale, Judge of Hampshire County Courts; Mr. Serjeant Miller, Judge of Leicester County Courts; Sir Phillip Francis, Judge of the Supreme Court in the Levant; Mr. Percival Coker, Q.C.; Mr. Henry Rowcliffe, Q.C.; Mr. Francis Hart Dyke, Queen's Proctor.

THE EDUCATION ACT.—The Education Department has issued the following circular to borough school boards, under date December 30th. "Sir, The Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council desire me to remind you that the Act has now arrived when they have to see the necessary steps are taken for giving effect to the requirements of the Elementary Education Act of 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79), which comes into operation on the 1st of January 1877. Your borough is not within the section of a school board. It is therefore the duty of the Council (sect. 7) to appoint, without delay, a School Attendance Committee, by whom, and with authority for the district, the provisions of the Act will be enforced. My Lords will be glad to see, as soon as possible, that this committee has been appointed, and to know the names of the members who will serve upon it. The number of members of the School Attendance Committee, all of whom must be chosen from the Council, is, within certain limits (six to twelve), left to the discretion of the council. My Lords trust that, in fixing this number, due regard will be paid, not only to the population of the borough, but also to the novelty, variety, and importance of the duties devolving upon the committee. I am to suggest that, in the first instance, at all events, the full number allowed by the Act should be appointed if the population of the borough exceeds 5000 souls. The 32nd section gives power to the council to reduce the number of the committee if it should hereafter be deemed advisable to do so. I have, for the present, only further to request to be informed of the name and address of the clerk of the committee, that the necessary communications may be made to him respecting the duties which the local authority will have to discharge under the Act of 1876.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, F. R. SANDFORD. To the Mayor of the borough of—"

TITLE DEEDS.—Mr. O'Keefe writes to the Times,—Sutors in the Court of Chancery have not unfrequently found that in the end they have got their fingers burnt, but I much doubt if they have ever contemplated the risk they run of having their title deeds destroyed by fire. Among the busy throng who daily pass up and down Chancery-lane few probably know, and fewer still recollect, that in the dingy building on the western side, known as the Record and Writ Clerk's Office, are deposited for "safe custody," as it is called, the title deeds of estates representing an enormous and unknown value. These are the property of the sutors, whose interests are so insufficiently provided for that I venture to affirm, if fire broke out in this building, it and its contents would probably perish together. Neither the building nor the chambers in which the deeds are deposited have the slightest pretension to be considered fire-proof, and beyond the boxes (some of tin, but more often of wood) containing the deeds, there appears to be no protection at all. If I were myself a sutor, I should strenuously object to any order of Court by which any deeds or papers of mine were consigned to the most insecure place of deposit. They would be far safer in the hands of one of the London banks, all of which, I believe, possess fire-proof vaults; or the Incorporated Law Society, whose building in Chancery-lane contains spacious underground chambers, both fire-proof and dry, might well be entrusted with the safe custody of the muniments of the sutors. As matters at present stand, one trembles at contemplating the consequences which might follow from a fire in this building; and I am doing, I believe, good service to the sutors and their advisers in calling their attention to an evil which may be now remedied, before a catastrophe makes it impossible.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editors do not hold themselves responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

THE COMMON LAW JUDGES' CHAMBERS.—I have read the letter of Mr. Kelly, in the Times, on the practice at Judges' Chambers, your comments thereon in your last issue, and also those of "A Barrister" (reproduced, I presume), in the "Solicitors' Journal" of the 23rd inst. It is on account of the remarks of "A Barrister" that I trouble you with a letter on the subject. This barrister writes: "It is beyond all doubt the opinion of the large body of solicitors that it is expedient that counsel should be taken to chambers, but if Mr. Kelly is of a different mind, there is no possible obstacle to his practising personally in chambers, and he will find it a matter of little or no difficulty to get before the master if he goes at a time which is not fixed for the hearing of counsel's summonses." Is the learned gentleman in question not aware that the chief reasons why solicitors do not attend at judges' chambers, are, first, that it does not pay a solicitor to spend a large portion of his morning at chambers in order to earn the sum of 6s. 8d.; secondly, that solicitors possess such a thing as self-respect, and do not care to subject themselves to certain annoyances unless it is imperatively necessary that they should do so in the interests of their clients. As long as solicitors are allowed 6s. 8d., and barristers £2 2s., for doing the same work, the "higher" branch will not find much competition. It is the necessity of the thing that compels solicitors in active practice to instruct barristers and not choice. I agree with you that it is very doubtful whether complaints in the public press do much good. The matter of remuneration is certainly one in which the public have a right to an interest, and a right to express an opinion upon. The practical way for the Profession to deal with this and other questions which affect their interests or position is to join the Incorporated and the Legal Practitioners' Societies, attend their meetings, and impress on the council the necessity for bringing their wrongs before Parliament in the form of a Bill. The public will then have an ample opportunity of considering the matter, and if I am not much mistaken, will support the "lower" branch of the Profession. I use the terms lower and higher because they are conventional. I think solicitors, as a body, have sufficient self-respect, gentlemanly feeling and ability, both to hold their own and to disregard this classification, especially as it is made by the "higher" branch.

A CITY SOLICITOR.

[It is very difficult to understand what it is which could possibly offend the "self-respect" of solicitors personally attending Judges' Chambers; and how the "two branches" come into conflict in the matter is equally hard to understand. The insufficient remuneration to solicitors is doubtless one reason, but the loss of time entailed is the reason of their non-attendance. It is hardly ingenious to attribute it in any way to the Bar, who simply do their best on their instructions.—ED. L. T.]

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.—Will you allow me to supplement the letter of Mr. Shirley, our treasurer, which appeared in your issue last week, with reference to the establishment of a law library in connection with this society, by stating that the committee have determined upon making a strenuous effort in that direction; and at our meeting on the 17th inst. certain motions will be moved by me to carry out that object? I may add that from the promises of support we have already received I consider the success of the undertaking is assured.

J. S. RUBINSTEIN, Hon. Sec.

AGENTS PRACTISING AS ADVOCATES IN COUNTY COURTS.—It is really time some notice was taken of the style of doing work in our County Courts. We have certainly two really admirable and unusually painstaking judges, but the members of the legal profession receive little consideration. Touts carry on their vocation openly; agents and accountants frequently monopolise the only row of seats supposed to be set apart for solicitors, and that frequently and defiantly, to their exclusion, and recently before Mr. Thompson, I saw an important case conducted by an accountant for the plaintiff and a railway company's detective for the defendants; both these persons addressed the court for their respective clients in every way as a properly qualified advocate would be permitted to do. Surely it is quite time to ask how long is this sort of thing to go on, or if we have a law society worth naming?

NOTES AND QUERIES.

Queries.

48. BANKRUPTCY.—A. B. and C. are in partnership, C. retires and transfers his share in the partnership to A. and B. in consideration of their covenant to pay him £2000 at the end of the year, before the end of the year A. and B. are adjudicated bankrupts, C. is solvent, some of the joint creditors of A., B. and C. remain unpaid. What are the rights of such joint creditors under the bankruptcy of A. and B., and has C., and if so, what right to prove and receive dividends under the bankruptcy in respect of the £2000? B. B.

49. TRUSTEES—EXPENSES OF VARYING INVESTMENTS.—A trust instrument contains the usual form to vary investments at the request of the cestui que trust for the time being. The investments are from time to time varied, the transactions being conducted through the solicitors of the trustees. Are their costs and the brokers' commissions and transfer stamps chargeable to the trust capital account or to the trust income account, or to the cestui que trust personally? Please refer to an authority. SUBSCRIBER.

50. EMPLOYERS' AND WORKMAN'S ACT.—(1) Is a woman employed by a laundry company as a first-class ironer of linen and wearing apparel a skilled labourer within the above act? (2) Is a justice's clerk warranted in refusing to allow a summons to issue under this Act in such a case? (3) If yes, cannot the company's solicitor, as of right, apply to the magistrates in open court for a summons in order to raise the first query? AN ARTICLES CLERK.

51. AGENCY CHARGES FOR SERVING WRITS OF SUMMONS.—In a recent issue you give a note of the proper charges to be made by a solicitor employed as agent for effecting service of a writ, which, however, do not apply to actions under the Bills of Exchange Act. I shall feel obliged if you or one of your correspondents will say what charges should be made in cases under this Act. S. S. C.

[The same as the charges you refer to, except that copy writ is allowed 1s., and special endorsement 3s.—ED.]

52. BILLS OF SALE ACTS—FIXTURES.—A., the lessee of certain works, deposits the lease with B., with a memorandum that such deposit is made for securing the balance then due, or which should, from time to time, become due from A. to B. This memorandum is not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts. A subsequently files his petition for liquidation, and trustees are appointed. The trustees claim all the fixtures belonging to the works, comprising engines, plant, and machinery, on the grounds that the memorandum should have been registered. Can B. claim the fixtures, and would it have made any difference if no memorandum had accompanied the deposit? S. S. C.

53. SETTING DOWN CAUSE.—Will you be good enough to inform me through the medium of your paper when the alteration in Order XXXVI., r. 17, was made. I refer to the part of the rule which renders it necessary now to deliver two copies of the pleadings on setting down an action for trial, instead of as previously, one copy only? And whether the change was made by additional rules of court or under what authority? LEX.

54. MORTGAGES—PAID-OFF DEEDS IN CUSTODY OF MORTGAGEES.—A. mortgaged three properties to a building society at three different times. The first two mortgages have been fully discharged by the mortgagor some time ago, but the deeds remain in the hands of the trustees of the society, and no statutory receipts have been indorsed. The third property has recently been sold under the power of sale in the mortgage for considerably less than the amount owing upon it. It is presumed that A. cannot require a release of the other two mortgages, or delivery of the deeds, unless he pays the deficiency on the third property. But can the trustees take any active steps to reimburse their loss? Can they take possession of the rents, or sell the other properties, or apply to the court for a sale? LLEWELLYN WILLIAMS.

55. VENDORS' COSTS OF CONVEYANCE.—Mr. Davidson in his Precedents of Conveyancing, vol. 1, third edition, page 500, says, "The expense attending the perusal and execution of the conveyance by all necessary parties falls on the vendor, including the costs of all matters essential to the validity of the deed as a perfect conveyance, e.g., the acknowledgment by married women and the filing of the certificate of acknowledgment." Conditions of sale include the following: "The vendor shall execute proper assurances and the same together with every other deed, matter, or thing which shall be required for completing or perfecting the vendor's title or for any other purpose shall be prepared by the purchaser." Vendor's solicitor contends this relieves him from the expense of acknowledgment and filing. Purchaser's solicitor argues contra. Which is right? C. S. B.

56. STAMPS ON AGREEMENTS FOR SALE.—In preparing conditions of sale by auction of standing timber in lots, the question of the stamp duties on the contracts had to be considered. In "Prideaux's Precedents," vol. 1, p. 83, 8th ed., I find the following: "A purchaser of several lots at an auction is considered to have entered into an equal number of agreements for the purchase of the same lots, so that the agreement must bear as many stamps as there are lots, assuming that the purchase money of each lot amounts to £5." In my case each lot will fetch more than £5. In the case of a purchaser of say five lots, I take it that the original contract will have to be sent to Somerset House to have a 5s. 6d. stamp impressed, or should the stamps be severally 6d.? Five agreement stamps on a small contract take up more than the space left blank. In practice, I think it often happens that one 6d. stamp only is put on a contract for the purchase of two or more lots of freehold or leasehold property, in fact the question of stamp duty in such a case as stated, so far as I can learn, appears to have been rather overlooked by the profession generally. ## LAW SOCIETIES.

LAW ASSOCIATION.

THE usual monthly meeting of the directors was held at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, on Thursday, the 4th inst., the following being present, viz.: Mr. Tyles (chairman), and Messrs. Carpenter, Collierson, Cronin, Kelly, Masterman, Nisbet, Parkin, Scaddin, Styann, and Boodle (secretary). A grant of £40 was made to the widow of a deceased member. An announcement of the death of Mr. Park Nelson, one of the treasurers, was made, and a resolution expressive of the loss which the association had sustained by this lamentable event was passed unanimously, and the ordinary general business was transacted.

BRADFORD INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

In their annual report the council say:—The society was registered the 7th Dec. 1875, and numbers thirty-seven members, of whom thirty-five are Bradford members, paying the full entrance fee and subscription, and two are country members.

A considerable number of the older reports have been lent to the society, mainly by Messrs. Rawson, George, and Wade, and W. F. Atkinson, Esq., to whose liberality, and that of other members the society is much indebted.

A set of Reports has been acquired upon request, partly by purchase from the executors of James Green. The current and its reports, are also duly supplied to the society.

Edward Hailstone, Esq., has also intimated his intention of selecting from his law library a number of reports which he proposes to give or lend to the society, after which it is hoped that the funds of the society will enable them to complete their series.

The committee have not yet been able to do more than organise the society and form the basis of a library, but it is hoped that steps may be taken at the annual meeting to promote the other objects referred to in the Memorandum of Association.

As there are still twenty solicitors or thereabouts in Bradford who have not joined the society, it is hoped that the members will make an effort to induce them to do so.

The books in the library have already been generally used, and as the society will now be able to afford its members access to a varied and increasing library of Law Reports it is hoped that one great want which the society was established to supply will be adequately met.

The council trust in conclusion that the society may receive in the future more general support from the Profession both in Bradford and the neighbourhood, and they do not doubt that it will fully justify its existence and attain the objects for which it was established.

Mr. Lister will collect on behalf of the society the subscriptions for the current year, due 1st Oct. last.

and, in a minor degree, of the legal profession, we would urge immediate action; the arrears are really enormous, and increasing. Mr. MORGAN, we believe, will bring the matter before the House of Commons on an early day, but no parliamentary pressure should be required to induce the Government to apply the remedy to the deadlock which now exists.

It will, apparently, be very difficult to carry out the intentions of the Legislature with respect to the Common Law Divisions. On the opening of the Sittings on Thursday, two or more Judges were sitting together in all the Divisions, there being three in the Queen's Bench. Parliament made a blunder when it left the distribution of judicial power subject to orders to be made by the Judges themselves. The words in sect. 17 of the Act of 1876, "so far as is practicable and convenient" are fatal words. If Parliament undertakes to regulate judicial business, it should do so thoroughly and completely. Comparisons are odious, but we must say that this enactment is similar in effect to a direction in a Government department that every clerk shall have a certain amount of work allotted to him, unless all the clerks resolve amongst themselves that they will share the work amongst them as they may feel disposed.

ANOTHER journal has been added to the list of publications the object of which seems to be to gain the ear of the public by retailing unpleasant social incidents connected with the lives of eminent persons. This is sufficiently lamentable when the eminent persons concerned fill positions which are independent of popular respect; but when the reverse is the case the consequences cannot fail to be serious. Unluckily the class of periodical to which we refer appears to be successful in enlisting the services of one or more hangers-on of the legal profession, and the last novelty of this kind has in each issue disclosed this circumstance in contributions excessively ill-judged and in the worst possible taste. The Bar knows, moreover, perfectly well how to take care of itself, and can, when necessary, most effectually resent undeserved judicial slights. When slights of this nature are indulged in with reference to matters of imperial importance, they recoil severely upon the heads of their authors. All this takes place without publicity, and nothing but evil consequences can result from the publication in periodicals of the description referred to of articles of a sensational character, directed against the judicial bench, and we hope that members of the legal profession will keep aloof from journals which seek to live by such discreditable devices.

SOLICITORS and their clients have so great an interest in the question to which we referred in our last week's issue, namely, the right of the former to receive commission from third parties to whom they introduce business, that no excuse is necessary for again referring to the same topic, and showing the views taken by the Judges with regard to such a practice. It must, in the first place, be clearly understood that the question is one which affects all persons who are in a fiduciary position. Thus, where a master of a ship received a premium for a bill on account of the ship, Lord ELLENBOROUGH refused to admit evidence of a usage for masters of ships to appropriate such premiums to their own use. Having expressed his opinion that the premiums belonged to the owner, and not to the captain, his Lordship continued, "If a contrary usage has prevailed, it has been a usage of fraud and plunder. What pretence can there be for an agent to make a profit by a bill upon his principal? This would be to give the agent an interest against his duty." (Diplock v. Blackburn, 3 Camp. 43, decided in 1811). So, too, an agent will not be permitted to make a profit of goods supplied by him to his principal or partner. (Burton v. Wookey, 6 Madd. 367; Bentley v. Craven, 16 Beav. 75). To the same effect is Ritchie v. Cooper (28 Beav. 344), decided in 1860, where a bill was filed for an account of the profits of a ship, of which the plaintiff and defendants were co-owners. The defendants managed the ship and supplied provisions in the way of their business as grocers and ship biscuit bakers. They charged the ordinary and not the cost prices; and the plaintiff asked for a declaration that the defendants were only entitled to charge the cost price of the provisions. The defendants alleged that the ordinary price was charged with the full knowledge and assent of the plaintiff. As this allegation was not denied the MASTER of the ROLLs refused to make the declaration, though he intimated that but for this fact he would have directed that in taking the accounts the defendants should be allowed the cost price only. (As to a plaintiff's knowledge and assent, see Wilson v. Short, 6 Hare. 306.) In Turnbull v. Garden (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; 38 L. J. 331, Ch.), the principal prayed, amongst other things, for an account against her agent. The principal, being in the East Indies, employed the defendant, who was an army agent and account-treant maker in London, to receive her income, and to make payment out of it by her authority. Whilst the defendant was so employed, he was instructed by the plaintiff (the principal) to provide a cavalry outfit for her son. He did so, but instead of charging her the sum he actually produce elsewhere a letter from Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, M.P., to the Times, on the serious evils arising, and likely to arise from the insufficient staff of judges in the Chancery Division, and that the position of matters is fully appreciated by the Government, which, however, is reluctant to make necessary appointments. In the interests of suitors the tradesmen, from whom he obtained the goods, he charged her from 15 to 25 per cent. more. He alleged that he was entitled to do so by the custom of his trade as army agent. "It is not the first time," said Vice-Chancellor JAMES, "that the court has heard and disapproved of the custom of 'salting' invoices. If the case had simply been one of a division of profits between tradesmen and a commission agent, the case would have stood on a different footing. But here there was quite a different case, and one which showed the danger of allowing the smallest violation of the rule of the court, by which persons standing in a fiduciary relationship were prohibited from deriving any profit from such a relationship, and that an agent cannot make the smallest perquisite out of his fiduciary position." These remarks are very strong. That a fiduciary relation exists between a solicitor and his client is well established, but the question may be asked whether there is not a difference in principle between the above cases and those in which the solicitor receives a commission which is not added to what the client would be required to pay supposing no commission were given, but subtracted from ordinary and fixed charges, in which case the commission could not be said to come out of the client's pocket. This distinction is not, however, recognised in our courts of law, for the real question is not whether the receipt of commission by the solicitor causes an increased expense to the client, but whether the solicitor has made any profit in the course of his employment without the knowledge or consent of his client. Thus, where an action was brought by the purchaser of a steamship to recover a sum of £225 from the defendant, who being employed to buy the ship as cheaply as possible, received that sum as commission on the sale from the vendor, the court said, "Whilst an agent is bound to account to his principal or employer for all profits made by him in the course of his employment or service, . . . there is at the same time a duty clearly incumbent upon him whenever any profits so made have reached his hands . . . to pay over the amount as money absolutely belonging to his employer." (Morison v. Thompson, L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 480.) Commission being profits, the whole matter may be reduced to a syllogism, all agents are bound to account to their employers for all profits made by them in the course of their employment: Solicitors are agents. Therefore all solicitors are bound to account to their employer (the client) for all profits made by them in the course of their employment.

THE rule of law that the owner of one piece of land may use it in the natural course of user, unless by so doing he violates the legal rights of another, has received an illustration of great practical importance to workers of mines in the recent case of Wilson v. Waddell (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 639), in which the House of Lords affirmed the decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland. The parties to the action were lessees under the same landlord of the minerals of contiguous pieces of land. The soil which lay over the minerals was naturally impervious to water, but in working his mine the respondent caused the surface water to flow through, a number of cracks having opened during the progress of his mining operations. This water flowed through the respondent's mine, and thence into that of the appellants, which was at a lower level. The latter thereupon claimed damages for the loss they had sustained by reason of the increased expense cast upon them by the inflowing of the water. The court below decided that this was a case of damnum absque injuria, and this view was upheld in the House of Lords. "The question," said Lord BLACKBURN, "seems to be whether there is any servitude on the owners of the upper mines for the benefit of the owners of the mines on the dip to preserve either the surface or the subjacent minerals as water-tight as the undisturbed state of the strata." No authority was cited in support of such a proposition. "The general rule of land in both counties," continued his Lordship, "is that the owner of one piece of land has a right to use it in the natural course of user, unless in so doing he interferes with some right created either by law or contract, and as a branch of that law the owner of the minerals has a right to take away the whole of the minerals in his land, for such is the natural course of user of minerals; and a servitude to prevent such user must be founded on something more than mere neighbourhood." The well-known case of Rylands v. Fletcher (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 220) is the leading authority upon questions like the present. A comparison of the judgment of the LORD CHANCELLOR in that case with the decision in Wilson v. Waddell, shows that the same principles run through both cases.

BILLS OF SALE ACT AS APPLIED TO FIXTURES.

By the Bills of Sale Act of 1854 it was in the interpretation clause declared that "personal chattels," the subject of the enactment, should mean "goods, furniture, fixtures, and other articles capable of complete transfer by delivery, and should not include chattel interests, real estate." It was further declared that "personal chattels" should not be in the "apparent possession" of the person to whom the bill of sale, so long as they should remain or be in or upon any house or other premises occupied by him, or as they shall be used or enjoyed by him place whatsoever, notwithstanding that formal possession may have been taken by or given to any other person.

The application of these words to the varying circumstances of the cases which have called for decision has given rise to difficulty.

One of the most recent of these cases, that of Meux v. Chelmsford (L. Rep. 7 Eng. & Ir. Ap.), which, as having proceeded to the House of Lords, might have been expected to throw some considerable light on these vexed questions, really does nothing of the kind. Meux v. Jacobs found its way into the House of Lords through some misapprehension not of the law but of the facts of the case. The judgments delivered by Lords Chelmsford, Hatherley, and Selborne contain doubtless some very sound at the same time very trite statements of the law in regard to fixtures as affected by the Bills of Sale Act; but, so far as we see, neither the decision nor the dicta of the Lords settle any question that was previously open to fair discussion, nor unsettle any that had previously been accepted as settled. The case is distinctly treated as one which, if the facts had been duly ascertained in the court below, would not, or ought not, to have been brought before the higher tribunal.

In Meux v. Jacobs it was very clearly pointed out by Lord Chelmsford, Hatherley, and Selborne, that when (as in that case) there was no bankruptcy, insolvency, assignment for the benefit of creditors, on the part of the giver of the bill of sale, nor execution against him, then the Act could have no operation whatever. This was quite enough for the decision of the case, no doubt could have been reasonably entertained that a mortgage of land carries with it to the mortgagee all fixtures, including trade fixtures, and whether set up by the mortgagor before or after the mortgage. The Bills of Sale Act does not raise the question of what passes by the mortgage, but declares that in given circumstances as well as against certain classes of persons it shall be void. What is really left in doubt by that case, what Lord Selborne as taking part in it expressly declined giving an opinion on, was whether in the cases where there had been bankruptcy, &c., on the mortgagor's part, or execution against him, the mortgagee of the land was bound to register the mortgage in respect of trade or other fixtures removable as between landlord and tenant which might be annexed to it.

When the mortgage of the land is in fee simple or for term, it cannot, we think, be maintained that the deed in respect of the fixtures annexed requires registration, indeed, the very contrary is stated by Mr. Justice Lush, who says, in Butlin v. Butlin (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 532; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 290): "A conveyance of a manufactory is in fee or for a term of years, and cannot be said to be a bill of sale of chattels, although machinery may pass as part of the factory. The deed being a conveyance of the land, does not require to be registered, although the machinery passes with it. The precise point was decided by the Lords Justices in Ex parte Barclay, re Jones (L. T. Rep. N. S. 479; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 576), where it is laid down in the clearest and most satisfactory manner that the test whether a mortgage deed of a building and fixtures requires registration under the Bills of Sale Act, is whether it gives power to the mortgagee to sell or take possession of the fixtures separately from the building. In Hawtrey v. Butlin, a house mortgaged a factory by under demise and by a separate deed assigned (subject to redemption) the trade fixtures absolutely to the court held the assignment within the Act. A similar decision was come to by the Court of Chancery Appeal in Ex parte Daglish, re Wilde (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 168; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 576), the fact that the fixtures were there demised with the land being held not to vary the case, inasmuch as a power for the mortgagee to sell them separately was also contained in the deed.

It cannot, we think, be said, as was said by Mr. Justice Lush, County Court Judge at Aberdare, whose judgment in a case involving the validity of the two last-mentioned decisions, which will be found in our impression of the 7th Oct. last, they have been overruled by Meux v. Jacobs, especially when Lord Selborne, referring to the case of Ex parte Daglish, and a similar case of Begbie v. Fenwick (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58), before Lord Chancellor Malins, which had been commented on in the judgments of counsel, speaks thus: "My Lords, whether these decisions were correctly decided or not is not the question before your Lordships. It may be an important question, and for my own part I think your Lordships would desire to abstain upon this occasion from expressing any opinion on the subject, it not being necessary to do so."

The doctrine of the Court of Queen's Bench, Vice-Chancellor Malins and the Lords Justices, appears to be that if the mortgagee of land takes in the annexed fixtures an interest larger than otherwise than as incidental to, the estate or term in the land to which they are annexed, and which would carry with it the right to sell or sever them, the deed is within the Act.

We think this doctrine fully accords with the policy of the Bills of Sale Act, and is likely to be maintained by the court of appeal.

would be a very narrow construction to hold that the meaning of "fixtures" in the Act can or ought to be restrained so as to apply only to fixtures which are mortgaged separately from the land to which they are annexed. Neither, to go a step further, could it be sufficient that the fact of the mortgagee taking some lease or term in the land should ipso facto exempt the mortgagee from the necessity for registration in respect of the fixtures, if, so far as the mortgage confers on the mortgagee by means of the power of severance and sale of the fixtures, or otherwise, a right to them larger or other than his right as incident to their annexation to the land. It would, as Lord Justice James points out in Ex parte Daglish, open a wide door through which conveyancers might evade the statute, if the existence of, e.g., a short term or a tenancy from year to year vested in the mortgagee, were permitted to exclude the operation of the Act from fixtures which, for all practical purposes, belonged to the mortgagor and were, as to the absolute property therein vested, subject to redemption, in the mortgagee. There is a passing doubt, whether in such cases the bill of sale of the mortgagor should not, to the extent of his interest in the fixtures arising from and incidental to their annexation to the land, be treated as if it had been registered. He has endeavoured, it is true, to secure for himself a right of interest in the fixtures than the law will accord to the mortgagor of an unregistered bill of sale, but why, it may be asked, should such a futile attempt be the means of depriving him of a lesser right or benefit to which he would otherwise be entitled? This is the answer perhaps and probably is, that the lesser right is completely merged in the greater—that the partial and qualified ownership incident to the annexation is lost in the complete ownership of the mortgagee arising out of special contract.

From the report of the case at Aberdare the mortgagor appears to have been possessed of a colliery, as lessee, and to have mortgaged the same by demise, but to have assigned the trade fixtures subject to redemption, absolutely. There was a power for the mortgagee to sell after a fixed date. Before that day arrived the mortgagor's estate went into liquidation. The bill of sale not having been registered, Mr. Falconer held that the title of the mortgagee to the fixtures was nevertheless good as against the trustee under the liquidation. The case, it will be readily perceived, was in substance and for all practical purposes the same as that of Hawtreys v. Butlin (ubi sup.). It appears, therefore, to us clear that, as a Judge of an inferior court, he was bound by the decision in that case, and in the similar one of Ex parte Daglish, and as we have seen before, it is equally clear that he was entirely mistaken in supposing that these cases have been overruled or in any way shaken by Meux v. Jacobs. But for this mistaken impression we scarcely think that Mr. Falconer would have considered the subsidiary reasons put forward sufficient in themselves to support his judgment.

Now we understand to be, first, that the Act is not to apply to chattel interests in real estate. To which the answer of course is that "fixtures" are specifically subjected to its operation, and are therefore to be excepted from the larger general words which, taken by themselves, might be construed as including them; secondly, that the time at which the mortgagee was authorised to exercise his power of sale, had not arrived when the title of the mortgagee in liquidation accrued. This is answered by the case of Leaman v. Miller (12 Com. B. N. S. 659), which shows that a mortgagee of chattels personal (as fixtures are for the purposes of the Act), cannot, by inserting a provision that the mortgagor shall hold until demand, notice, &c., exclude the operation of the Act as to reputed or apparent ownership.

COUNTY COURT APPEALS.

The whole question of appeals from County Courts will probably, at some distant period, occupy the attention of the Legislature, and it may not be inopportune at the present time to take a general survey of the subject, pointing out at the same time one or two points which require the most immediate consideration. This question of appeal, it will be recollected, was first given in 1850 by 14 Vict. c. 61, the Act which extended the ordinary jurisdiction of County Courts from £20 to £50. The 14th section of that Act provides that if either party in any cause of the amount to which jurisdiction is given by the Act "shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the said court in point of law, or in the admission or rejection of any evidence," he may appeal to the Superior Court. To entitle him to be heard he must, however, within ten days of the determination or direction, have given security of such appeal to the other party, or his solicitor, and also approved security for the costs of the appeal, and, if he is dissatisfied, for the amount of the judgment. It is provided, however, that the latter security may be dispensed with in certain cases. The Court of Appeal is empowered either to order a new trial or judgment to be entered for either party, as the case might be. The 15th section provides for the form in which the appeal is to be made, and orders that it shall be in the form of a case agreed on by both parties, unless they cannot agree, in which case the Judge shall settle and sign it. Here, as pointed out in Ex v. Burgess (4 E. & B. 655) the right to appeal was made to extend to the amount legally recoverable.

Six years afterwards this right of appeal was further enlarged by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 108. The 68th section of this Act, enacting that an appeal on the same grounds and subject to the same conditions as are stated above, shall lie "in all actions of replevin where the amount of rent or damage exceeds £20, and in all actions for the recovery of tenements, when the yearly rent or value of the premises exceeds £20, and in proceedings in interpleader," when the value claimed amounts to £20, and in all actions where the parties agree that the court shall have jurisdiction. The next addition to the right was made eleven years afterwards, in 1867, by the Act of 30 and 31 Vict. c. 142, which gave a right of appeal when a fresh jurisdiction was given. An important concession was also made by the 13th section of the same Act, which, after allowing an appeal in actions in ejectment and in actions where title comes in question, provides that, with leave of judge, "an appeal shall be allowed in actions in which an appeal is not now allowed, if the judge shall think it reasonable and proper that such an appeal should be allowed." The utility of this provision is obvious. The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, sect. 45, provides a tribunal before which appeals shall be heard. Lastly, the County Court Act 1875 establishes a new mode of appealing, but it does not in any way extend the right of appeal.

The enactments cited contain the substantive law upon the right to appeal. Appeals are now either of right or in the discretion of the Judge, the latter being in no case confined to cases in which the amount at stake is at least a sum specified. The 6th section of the Act last referred to provides that in any proceeding, other than a proceeding in bankruptcy, any person aggrieved "by the ruling order, direction, or decision of the judge, at any time within eight days after the same shall have been made or given," may appeal by motion instead of by special case. It is likewise provided that at the hearing of any proceeding the Judge shall, at the request of either party, make a note of any question of law raised during the proceedings, and "of the facts in evidence in relation thereto, and of his decision thereon," but nothing is said of any duty incumbent upon the Judge to take such notes unless so requested. This raises an important inquiry, and it may be asked how, in the event of an appeal, the facts may be brought before the Divisional Court? The County Court rule 1875, Order XXIX., provides for appeals by special case. The appellant must prepare the case for appeal, but if the Judge does not approve of the case (which must be submitted to him), both parties shall be summoned before him; if they cannot agree the Judge shall himself determine the form of the case, and finally settle and sign the same. So much for appeals by special case. But inasmuch as appeals may be either by special case or by motion, it may be further asked whether, in the event of a party who gives notice of his intention to appeal by way of motion after the conclusion of the hearing or trial, but who has not requested the Judge to take notes, in accordance with sect. 6 of the Act of 1875, such party is entitled to call upon the Judge to do all things necessary to enable the appeal to be heard in that manner? Can he in fact require the Judge to make the notes mentioned in the above section, notwithstanding the fact that no notice was given during the proceeding? If we turn to the County Court rule relating to the question we shall not be much enlightened. Order XXIX., Rule 12, provides merely that the rules relating to appeals by special case in this order shall not apply to appeals by motion, "but such appeals may be had under the provisions of sect. 6 of The County Courts Act 1875." Now it must not be forgotten that the right to appeal by way of motion is a right wholly founded upon the above section, and that the right given is not an absolute right to which no condition is attached. On the other hand, it seems to result from the wording of the 6th section that the question whether the right exists at all in a particular case depends entirely upon the parties themselves. The right, so far as points which might be raised during the trial are concerned may be considered as being in posse during the hearing or trial, but if neither party takes the steps indicated during the proceedings, the right is no longer in posse, but at an end with the end of the proceedings, and it is too late then for the party to call upon the Judge to make a note. We believe the case to which we referred some time ago, in these columns bearing directly upon this question will shortly come before the Divisional Court, and we may, therefore, hope to have the question definitely settled. The matter is really not a very serious one, for in whatever way it may be decided it will not deprive an intending appellant of his right of appeal. If the view we have taken is correct, there still remains open the right of appeal by special case. A number of other questions might be raised with reference to appeals from County Courts. Such was that raised in the recent case of Cousins v. Lombard Deposit Bank (Limited) (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 495), where a motion was made for a new trial, on the ground that the decision of a County Court Judge was against the weight of evidence. It was clear and admitted that previous to the County Court Act 1875, there existed no means of reviewing a Judge's decision upon facts only, but it was contended that the effect of the 6th section was to remedy this. "What was the old law?" said Baron Cleasbrough. "Before that Act there could be no appeal except upon points of law."

law raised and stated by the Judge himself. The effect of this 6th section is merely to give parties an opportunity to appeal by way of motion upon the Judge's notes, instead of by a special case stated by him. The section does nothing but substitute a new mode of appeal for that which existed before." The motion was dismissed.

AGENCY—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO THIRD PARTIES WHERE THE AGENT ACTS WITHOUT AUTHORITY.(a)

WHEN an agent assumes to act as agent without authority the following cases may arise :

- (A) The agent may be aware that he has no authority at the time of entering into the contract.
- (B) He may act upon a bonâ fide belief that he has authority where none has in fact been conferred.
- (C) He may after the determination of his authority act upon a belief that his authority is still in force.
  1. Acting upon such belief he may omit to give to the other contracting party such information as would enable that other equally with himself to judge as to the authority under which he proposed to act.
  2. Acting upon such a belief he may give to the other contracting party all such information.

The leading case upon the last point is that of Smout v. Ilbery (10 M. & W. 1), decided in the year 1842. This was an action for goods supplied to a married woman by the plaintiff, who had been in the habit of supplying the defendant's husband, and who continued to supply the wife after her husband went abroad, where he died. The question for the court to determine was whether the wife was liable for the goods supplied from the date of her husband's death until the arrival of the news of the death. A verdict having been given for the plaintiff, a rule was obtained to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial had, on the ground that the defendant was not liable for the meat supplied after but before she had any knowledge of her husband's death. It had been previously decided that a principal's executor is not liable under the circumstances. The court having taken time to consider its judgment, which was delivered by Baron Alderson, held that the wife was not liable, on the ground "that there must be some wrong or omission of right on the part of the agent, in order to make him personally liable on a contract made in the name of his principal."

"There is no doubt," said the learned Baron, "that in a case of a fraudulent misrepresentation of his authority, with an intention to deceive, the agent would be personally responsible. But, independently of this, which is perfectly free from doubt, there seems to be still two other classes of cases, in which an agent who without actual authority makes a contract in the name of his principal, is personally liable, even where no proof of such fraudulent intention can be given. First, when he has no authority, and knows it, but, nevertheless, makes the contract as having such authority. In that case, on the plainest principles of justice, he is liable. For he induces the other party to enter into the contract on what amounts to a misrepresentation of a fact peculiarly within his own knowledge; and it is but just that he who does so should be considered as holding himself out as one having competent authority to contract, and as guaranteeing the consequences arising from any want of such authority. But there is a third class, in which the courts have held, that when a party making the contract bonâ fide believes that such authority is vested in him, but has no such authority, he is still personally liable. In these cases, it is true, the agent is not actuated by any fraudulent motives, nor has he made any statements which he knows to be untrue. But still his liability depends on the same principles as before. It is a wrong, differing only in degree, but not in its essence from the former case, to state as true what the individual making such statement does not know to be true, even though he does not know it to be false, but believes without sufficient grounds that the statement will turn out to be correct. And if that wrong produces injury to a third person who is wholly ignorant of the grounds on which such belief of the supposed agent is founded, and who has relied on the correctness of his assertion, it is equally just that he who makes such assertions should be personally liable for its consequences."

The same Judge, in continuation, remarked that on examination of the authorities the court was satisfied that all the cases in which the agent had been held personally responsible, will be found to arrange themselves under one or other of these three classes. The present case was distinguished these authorities. Here the agent had in fact full, originally, to contract, and did contract, in the name of the principal. There is no ground for saying that in representing herself she did any wrong whatever. There was no mala fide part—no want of due diligence in acquiring knowledge of the revocation, no omission to state any fact within her knowledge to it, and the revocation itself was by the grace of God continuance of the life of the principal was, under the circumstances," said the same judge, "a fact equally within the knowledge of both contracting parties. If, then, the true principle of the case is that there must be some wrong, or some fault on the part of the agent in order to make him personally liable on a contract made in the name of his principal, it follows that the agent is not responsible in such a case as the present." And to this conclusion the court came. Some thrown upon the latter remarks by an observation made by the same learned Judge in the course of the argument. "The question is this, whether, where an agent contracts in the name of his principal, and it turns out afterwards that there is no authority, and there is no fraud in the case, the agent is liable as principal." The judgment of the court was also supported by reference to the ordinary case at common law of a person who makes a contract in the lifetime of her husband without his authority. This case was referred to in argument in a subsequent case, v. Trimen, 18 C. B. 786, 856), when Chief Justice Jervis said that there was no representation at all by the defendant, and that the plaintiff was misled by a circumstance equal to the knowledge and beyond the control of both parties.

From the above judgment it is clear that the court on that all cases in which an agent has been rendered liable for misrepresentation of authority, viz., assuming to act without authority, may be reduced to some one or other of three classes following:

1. Where the agent has made a fraudulent misrepresentation.
2. Where he has no authority, and knows it, but nevertheless makes the contract as having such authority.
3. Where, acting as agent under a bonâ fide belief that he has authority, he omits to give to the other contracting party such information as would enable that other equally with himself to judge as to the authority under which he proposed to act.

LAW LIBRARY.

The Inns of Court Calendar (London: Butterworths) is a publication for which Mr. Charles Shaw, the Under Treasurer of the Middle Temple, is responsible. The object of the publication is to supply a calendar to the Inns of Court similar to that published by the Universities. It gives the names, titles, and so on, of the judges, a list of the benchers, and other like information, the bulk of it is devoted to barristers and students. It gives particulars about every barrister, e.g., the date of his admission, his call, and his academical degree. In this, however, it is conspicuous. Within the limits of the reviewer's own knowledge, several well-known graduates appear without any mention of their degree. In one instance a barrister appears under a Christian name, his surname being put after it, so that, if he is figuring as Smith, John, his name is given John, Smith. There are many men at the Bar who have received a better education than is frequently met with amongst distracting sports at the Universities, and who have enjoyed University education without graduating. Only two prominent cases are these cases noticed. We do not think that a compiler is entitled to use an arbitrary discretion as to the line is to be drawn in the personal history of men upon whose career he undertakes to give. Nor do we think that he should print everything a person chooses to say of himself as an absurdity for one gentleman to mention that he was called to the bar by a certain learned judge on circuit in a certain year, for to say that he practises before Parliamentary committees is never there; and for another to tell us that he has contributed articles to the Law Magazine! Equally absurd is it for a man to tell the legal world that for eight years he was an office man, and is now a "landowner." It is very evident that practising barristers don't care about parading their biographies, and we fear Mr. Shaw will have great difficulty in making more than a bare record of facts which he can obtain from several Inns. In any event, we doubt its value, and do not see what useful purpose it is to serve.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

as true as it is astonishing that one of the important provisions under Order XXII. of rules of the Supreme Court is entirely overlooked by a large number of solicitors. We are familiar with the power by Order XIV., rule 1, is given to the court judge to permit a plaintiff to sign final judgment after appearance to a writ of summons duly endorsed under Order III., rule 6, but in cases, where the court or a judge refuses to sign such an order, which in effect operates to a defendant to defend, it is not an uncommon thing for plaintiff's solicitor, at the expiration of time limited by Order XXII., rule 3, to sign a statement for want of statement of defence, such statement of defence not being delivered by defendant's solicitors under the misimpression that his client is entitled to a statement of claim. Nothing, however, can be clearer than that in such a case a plaintiff need not deliver any statement of claim. It is clearly provided for in Order XXII., rule 3, that it is necessary for a defendant's solicitor, in actions in which an order has been refused a summons issued under Order XIV., rule 1, to deliver a statement of defence within eight days after the day when leave to defend is in effect, or within such further time as may be ordered at the time of the making of the application under Order XIV., rule 1. Owing to the fact the provision under Order XXII., rule 3, has been overlooked in many instances, the common masters have had occasion to make orders for costs aside judgments on payments of costs, judgments having been signed, for want of statement of defence, after leave to defend. Of course, in a case under Order XX., rule 1, where a statement of claim has been dispensed with, our remarks do not apply. While upon this subject we draw attention to an impression which prevails, that any indorsement on a writ of summons amounts to a special indorsement so as to entitle the plaintiff to the sum of 5s. costs thereof. This, however, is only allowed under Order rules 6 and 7, and the common law taxing masters have in many cases refused to allow any fee for indorsement on a writ of summons, but in the case of such indorsements as are required by Order III., rule 6 being the indorsement required under Order XIV., rule 1. A special indorsement may be said to be a writ of summons which would entitle a plaintiff to substitute a notice in lieu of statement of claim under Order XXI., rule 1.

appointment of a new judge and of additional clerks for the Chancery Division is made. The commencement of the present year found this important division of the Court of Justice with a list of 567 causes to be disposed of, while the list of this time last year only 365 causes ready for hearing. The very arrears, the existence of which has long been proverbial, are therefore rapidly on the increase, and the operation of the Judicature Acts has been to aggravate the evil attendant upon delay in the despatch of the business of this division. We do not pretend to say that the list of 567 causes ought to have been cleared off before the last Michaelmas sittings, but a large proportion, certainly over 300 causes, constitutes the arrears, besides a considerable amount of other business of a very important character. This brings us to another matter worthy of consideration, namely, whether some arrangement not be made whereby the chamber business which the Chancery judges are called upon to attend to, cannot be disposed of on any one day in each week instead of being left to hang about half-past four o'clock after the day has risen, and when judges are tired and solicitors can ill afford the time to wait in the purlieus of Judges' Chambers as at present.

In our column we publish an abbreviated report of the annual general meeting of the Portsmouth and Gosport Law Society. The way in which some very important resolutions, or, rather, suggestions, were received at this meeting, is neither encouraging or promising in connection with the future of the solicitors' profession; indeed, it looks as if this society, which, under the influence of the impetus it has received of other local character, has shown signs of life and which did it credit, would, if left to itself, languish. It was actually considered unnecessary to have any annual report of the society's proceedings submitted to the general meetings. As to fix a minimum fee of 150 guineas as a fee to be taken with articles of clerkship received no support, or, at least, so we gather from the report before us; and the fact that the Bolton Law Society had adopted a resolution fixing 250 guineas as the lowest figure, was mentioned to no effect; indeed, one member hinted that even under 100 guineas might be taken under certain circumstances, while a correspondent, writing in reference to this meeting, and in reference to this particular motion, states that even smaller premiums are taken in Portsmouth, and that such sums are not paid down but are made payable over the period of the term of service. As to a law library, which towns with fewer practitioners than there are in Portsmouth already possess, the mover of a resolution favouring the formation of such a useful institution seems to have been regarded as quixotic for venturing upon such a proposal; while as to solicitors asserting their right in connection with Parliamentary agency business, the society instead of taking action decided to do so on some future occasion. This society is in effect represented on the council of the Incorporated Law Society, a distinction of which it is really hardly worthy, if we may judge by the report of the recent meeting, which is before us. There seems to be little or no desire on the part of the majority of those local practitioners who belong to it to take an active and prominent part in those professional reforms, the accomplishment of which is only delayed by the apathy of the great bulk of solicitors throughout the country.

THE Council of the Incorporated Law Society elect the extraordinary members of the council from among the members of the society who are presidents of Country Law Societies. It is to be hoped that while the number is limited, as at present, the council will not be content to look at the qualifications of such presidents, but more especially at the character of the societies which such presidents represent. The learned President of the Portsmouth and Gosport Law Society, for instance, is all that can be desired, except that he belongs to the old school of lawyers, and looks, perhaps, with doubt on many of those proposed alterations and reforms within the Profession which will soon be insisted on by the younger members of the Profession; but the Portsmouth Society—judging by the report of the proceedings at the recent annual meeting—is not a society having any special claim upon the patronage of the council of the chief law society. At the moment when Portsmouth solicitors consider the formation of a law library out of the question, the Bradford Law Society has purchased a set of law reports, and with the aid of books lent by various members, has succeeded in forming a law library at Bradford.

EVER since the Judicature Acts came into operation, we have had occasion, from time to time, to call attention to the want of uniformity of practice in the common law offices and chambers. Two points of this character, which have just come to our notice, deserve notice. In the Common Pleas Division an appearance is required to be prepared on the usual printed form, bearing an impressed stamp of 2s. in the case of one defendant, while in the Queen's Bench Division no objection is made in the very numerous instances in which adhesive stamps are used for like purposes. The further order as to fees by stamps of 22nd April 1876, provides that the fee payable on entering an appearance is to be denoted by an impressed stamp, except that in the case of an appearance of more than one person entered on the same memorandum, the fees for all persons beyond the first are to be denoted by means of impressed or adhesive stamps. The difference in practice at present prevailing frequently occasions delay and unnecessary trouble to common law clerks. It is a great pity that the old practice was not adhered to of allowing the use of adhesive stamps in all such cases. The second case is as to certificates of non-appearance. In the Queen's Bench Division these certificates are issued and acted upon without any stamp, either impressed or adhesive, being used for the purpose, while in the Common Pleas Division the use of a shilling stamp is in every case insisted on. The order as to court fees of 28th Oct. 1875, provides for the payment of 1s. upon taking a certificate of non-appearance, such stamp being 4s. on the higher scale, and the further order as to taking fees by stamps of 22nd April 1876, provides in the schedule that such fee upon a certificate of non-appearance shall be paid by means of an impressed or adhesive stamp. We have already called attention more than once to the difference in many of the forms used in one common law division as compared with forms used for similar purposes in the other divisions. If the common law masters would but meet and agree to a uniform procedure in all the common law divisions it would be conferring a boon on the Profession.

A CORRESPONDENT forwards to us a draft bill of costs in which no separate charge is made for copies of writs of summons for service on defendants, and in which a sum of 5s. only is charged for copy and service of subpoenas ad testificandum and subpoenas duces tecum, and inquires the present practice of the taxing masters on these two points. The masters have for a long time past allowed 1s. for copies of writs, or 4d. a folio for such copies, whichever the plaintiff's solicitor prefers; this, of course, in addition to the usual 5s. for service of same, and as to copy and service of subpoenas, a sum of 1s. and 4d. a folio, is in this case also allowed in addition to the usual fee for service of same. This is in each case provided for in the schedule of costs issued with the additional rules of court of August 1875. We may further add that no costs are allowed for attending printer with draft pleadings, or with the proof thereof. In agency cases close copies of a party's own pleadings are not allowed as against the opposite party on taxation, and country solicitors will do well to remember that the costs of summonses for time other than the first summons are disallowed on taxation between party and party. The costs of an affidavit of increase are now usually allowed, although not called for by the other side, especially where any objection is taken by the other side, which is answered by reference to such an affidavit, but the practice on this point is not uniform in all the common law divisions.

A WELL-KNOWN firm of solicitors, practising at Durham, have forwarded us the usual printed notice to creditors of a general meeting of creditors as provided by sect. 125 and 126 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, accompanying which notice is the usual form of proxy. The notice is signed by the debtors themselves. In sending us these papers our correspondents say: "We inclose you exact copy of a notice, convening first general meeting under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which has been sent to a client of ours. It will be observed that the forms are prepared by an accountant, and that no solicitor is employed in the case. We consider this to be an offence under sect. 60 of the Stamp Act, 1870, and one of which not only the Incorporated Law Society and the Legal Practitioners' Society should take notice, but also that Government should institute a prosecution in the case, as the encroachments of accountants in the north of England are increasing daily." On the face of the papers there is nothing to show that the debtors themselves may not have prepared the notices; but it would no doubt be an offence for an accountant to do so for fee or reward. If this should be found to be the fact the matter should be represented to the Inland Revenue authorities.

THE practice of parliamentary agency as at present prevailing is—as our readers are aware—threatened with material changes, which will operate very adversely to the interests of the great bulk of solicitors throughout the country, and it would be a great misfortune if the Council of the Incorporated Law Society should be induced to relax its efforts in the interests of solicitors by the promise of certain limited concessions at the hands of those agents who are really seeking to obtain a monopoly. Mr. Henry N. Wordsworth, in writing upon this subject, says: "Agents require and receive a large discount from the printers on the amount of the printers' bills, and the clerks or the senior clerks of the agents get a discount in addition. You may take it as a fact that it is the custom of the printer to allow the agent himself 10 per cent. on the amount of the printing bill paid by the agent, and in addition for the clerks or the senior clerk to get an additional 5 per cent. or more. Now an unnecessary 15 per cent. on the cost of printing is a serious matter to those who have to pay it in the end. No one can be better aware than your lordship of the important element which printing constitutes with respect to the cost of private bill legislation. Parliamentary printing, as you must be well aware, is charged at a much higher rate than ordinary printing, whether despatch is required or not, and the additional cost, coupled with the 15 per cent. discount, must run the printing charges up to nearly 50 per cent. more than for ordinary work under similar circumstances. A little reflection will show that this 15 per cent. discount represents in the whole a considerable sum, at all events, upwards of £10,000 each session. I understand that the leading agents consider it derogatory to divide their fees with solicitors, but yet they see nothing derogatory in demanding (I cannot say accepting) so high a percentage on the printing. I understand, also, that there is a Parliamentary Printers' Association which recognises the practice. A portion of the printing, such, for instance, as the printing of the proceedings before the committees, is, I believe, dealt with by the solicitor instead of the agent, according to the etiquette which exists, probably grounded on convenience, the solicitor being in direct communication with his client's counsel and witnesses, but I am not aware whether or not solicitors receive or receive a similar allowance to the agents."

printers. If they did, I fancy I should have heard of it. Now, the case between a solicitor and an agent may be said to be different. Rightly or wrongly, according to the etiquette of the Profession as interpreted by the Law Society in Chancery-lane—I know not, and do not care to inquire which—a solicitor, according to my experience, often without any advance on account from his clients, disburses large sums of money out of his own pocket on behalf of clients, and if in such a case he takes a discount, putting aside the simple etiquette of the Profession, of which I say nothing, there would appear to be a sort of justification for his taking a discount in return for his advance of his own money. But an agent, at all events an eminent one, cannot divide his fees with his solicitors; he could not, of course, take up business of a speculative kind on the no cure no pay principle; he cannot let off his client in the case of non-success, but must, like counsel, ignore all such subsidiary circumstances, and receive his fees in any case. Further, it is a point of principle with the leading agents, as I know full well, at an early period of the session to estimate his disbursements, either the whole or in part, and to require an advance from the solicitor, and it is out of this advance that House fees are subsequently—that is, when the term of credit has expired, and the payments to printers, from which the large discount is deducted, are paid. There is reason to suppose that you are not acquainted with this or with certain other subsidiary matters relative to private bill legislation, which to some persons seem questionable. A recent regulation, however, with regard to certain gratuities heretofore payable at St. Stephens, shows that some attention has been directed to a subject which still requires investigation. That the leading agents are not entirely disingenuous might be inferred from their recent procedure at what they must have no doubt have deemed a critical moment in assisting certain solicitors in being placed upon the roll as agents, and thereby reducing the opposition to the regulations recently proposed—a circumstance which has attracted attention outside mere professional circles. We attach importance to the opinion of Mr. Wordsworth on the question with which he here deals, but we cannot suppose that any attempt on the part of leading firms of parliamentary agents, who are not solicitors, to stifle opposition by admitting certain well-known firms of solicitors within their ranks, will prove successful. Lord Redesdale himself would be the very first to condemn any action of this character, by those who will be so much benefited by the successful accomplishment of his Lordship's aims.

SPECIMEN DIGEST OF THE LAW AS TO SOLICITORS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

DETERMINATION OF THE RETAINER.

THE authority of a solicitor comes to an end:

- A. By performance of the matter authorised.
- B. By act of solicitor
  1. Withdrawing from cause.
  2. By giving up business.
  3. (In case of a firm) By dissolution of partnership.
- C. By act of client.
- D. By incapacity of solicitor.
  1. Death.
  2. Insanity.
  3. Being struck off the Rolls.
- E. By incapacity of client.
  1. Death.
  2. Insanity and appointment of a committee.
  3. Marriage of feme sole.
  4. Outlawry (probably).

A solicitor cannot, as a rule, be changed during the pendency of an action without an order to that effect.

Cons. Ord. III. r. 3 provides that:

A party suing or defending by a solicitor shall not be at liberty to change his solicitor in any cause or matter without an order of the court for that purpose, which may be obtained by motion or petition, as of course. Until such order is obtained and served, and notice thereof given to the clerk of records and writs, the former solicitor shall be considered the solicitor of the party.

Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 1853, r. 4, provides that:

No attorney shall be changed without the order of a judge.

Note.

See Viner Abr. Att. M.

Upon the death of the solicitor on the record no order to change is necessary, but notice should be given to the opposite party of the appointment of a new solicitor, or the client may be treated as appearing in person.

Collins v. Arnold, 1 B. C. R. 217.

Note 1.

Upon application on a client's behalf for an order to change the solicitor, the court must be satisfied that the client understands the nature of the application. Thus: In an application where the client was ignorant of the English language, the affidavits were required to show that the purpose and object of the motion were known and sanctioned by the client: (Davies v. Loveland, 3 C. B. 868.)

Note 2.

Three petitioners retained the same solicitor in an application to wind-up a company. The order was made, and subsequently two of the petitioners served, and obtained an order as of course at the Rolls to change their solicitor. Vice-Chancellor Hall, however, held that the two had no right to act separately, and the order to change the solicitor was discharged: (Re Norwich, &c., Building Society (22 W. R. 554).)

ARTICLE 35.

DURATION OF THE SOLICITOR'S AUTHORITY.

The authority of a solicitor in an action in the Common Law Divisions of the Supreme Court, continues up to signing final judgment.

See cases cited Chitty's Practice, vol. 1, 67.

Note 1.

Lord Coke says that an attorney's retainer to conduct a suit enabled him to sue out execution under it at any time within a year after the judgment (i.e. during the period when such an action might be brought), as well as to prosecute such execution afterwards.

Note 2.

Reference may also be made to the following dicta: The authority of an attorney is in general determined after judgment, but may still sue out execution and receive the money, and his receipt is then the same as that of the principal, and according to 1 Roll. Abr. 291, Attorney (M) cited in Com. Dig. Attorney B. (10) he may, after judgment, acknowledge satisfaction on the record.

Per Littledale, J., Savory v. Chapman, 11 A. & E. 534.

In Berina v. Hulme (15 M. & W. 96), the court expressed an opinion that the original retainer of a solicitor was not determined by the judgment, but continued afterwards, so as to warrant him in issuing execution within the time limited.

See per Lord Ellenborough in Brakenbury v. Poff, 12 East, 568.

So it is said by the court in Levi v. Abbott (4 Ex. 588): "The attorney in the suit has no right after judgment to settle the action on any other terms than payment of the debt and costs, and cannot discharge a defendant from custody on a copias ad satisfaciendum without receiving them (Savory v. Chapman, 11 A. & E. 534); nor, by parity of reasoning, where there has been an extent under an elegit. But he has the power to direct and manage the execution against the goods. If two writs of fi. fa. are out at the same time into different counties, there is no reason why, if one is executed and the debt satisfied, he may not order the sheriff to quit the possession of goods seized under the other. So if the seizure is met by a claim to the goods, which he thinks it not worth while to dispute, or where the landlord's claim for rent would absorb the value of the goods, there seems no reason why he may not abandon, nor why he may not for any other cause, when he thinks it most conducive to the benefit of his client."

Mr. Justice Lush, in his work on Practice, p. 251, also expresses an opinion that the solicitor's authority is not determined by the obtaining of judgment, but that it remains in force until the judgment is satisfied.

So in Chitty's Practice, vol. 1, 88.

A retainer of a solicitor to act as permanent solicitor is not irrevocable; it simply denotes a general employment as contradistinguished from an occasional or special employment.

Illustration.

A. agreed to become permanent solicitor to B., who after employing him upon that understanding for some time discharged him. In an action for breach of the agreement against B., the court held that A. could not recover: (Elderton v. Emmens, 4 C. B. 479; 16 L. J. 209, C. P.)

ARTICLE 36.

AUTHORITY CONFERRED.

A solicitor may act under a general or special retainer.

A solicitor acting under a general retainer has an implied authority to accept service of process and appear for the client, but he has no such authority to commence an action unless such an authority may be reasonably inferred from the terms which were used in the retainer.

Lush's Practice, vol. 1, 129.

Chitty's Pract. vol. 1, 86.

Anderson v. Watson, 3 C. & P. 214.

Illustrations.

A. placed money in the hands of his solicitor, B., to invest for him, and gave to him an unlimited discretion to do what was best. B. advanced the money to C. on mortgage, but discovering that the security was bad, he sued out a bailable writ in A.'s name against C. for the amount without A.'s knowledge. There was no doubt about the bona fides of B. The court held that B. was not liable in an action for acting without authority: (Anderson v. Watson (sup.).)

A solicitor acting under a special retainer must observe its terms strictly, nor has he any authority to do more than is necessary to carry out with effect the business authorised by the retainer.

See Chitty's Practice 1, 87, and cases cited.

As between the client and the opponent, the former is bound by every act of his solicitor done in the ordinary course of practice (provided there is no collusion or fraud), whether it is authorised or not.

Illustrations.

1. A solicitor pleads an improper plea, or action in an improper form.

3. The solicitor admits a fact to prevent a plea of proving it at the trial.

Blackburn v. Wilson, 26 L. J. 229, R.

4. The solicitor sues out an inquiry whereby trespass is committed.

Note.

In all those cases where the solicitor, acting negligently or against his instructions his client to other parties, the solicitor is liable to the client for the consequences of his negligence or breach of duty.

INSTANCES OF IMPLIED AUTHORITY ABSENCE OF EXPRESS PROHIBITION

An authority to sue for a debt is as to receive payment.

Fates v. F. & Co., 2 Doug. 621.

An order calling on a defendant to pay authority to pay plaintiff's solicitors.

Mason v. Whitehouse, 4 Bing. N. C. 8

An authority to bring an action authorises the solicitor to order the sheriff to withhold possession under a fi. fa.

Levy v. Abbott, 19 L. J. 33, Ex.

An authority to bring action is an authority to compromise client's case.

Chambers v. Mason, 5 C. B. N. S., 33.

Note.

In order to justify a solicitor to enter a compromise it would seem that he must be able to show

1. That he acted bona fide.
2. That he acted with reasonable skill.
3. That he did not act in opposition to express prohibition.

Priestwick v. Polley, 19 C. B. N. S., 508; 11 N. B. 390; 34 L. J. 189, C. P.

It is essential that there should be no objection. If there is, it is no defence to a compromise was entered into by the advice employed by the solicitor for the client's case.

Frays v. Foulkes, 23 L. J. 232, Q. B.; 31

In an action for goods sold and delivered plaintiff's solicitor has authority to enter a promise on the terms that the defendant will give the goods and pay the costs.

Priestwick v. Polley (sup.)

Although the authority of a solicitor is on final judgment being signed, yet if he is required to obtain satisfaction afterwards, he is authorised to bind his client by compromise.

Buller v. Knight, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 109.

A solicitor has full authority either to compromise or abandon the claims of his client if it is in a matter within the scope of the retainer.

Re Wood, 21 W. R. 104.

A solicitor authorised to enter up may enter an appearance.

Richardson v. Daly, 4 M. & W. 324.

One authorised to show cause against a writ for a mandamus may proceed to issue a writ.

Reg. v. Tichfield, 10 Q. B. 534.

One authorised to "do the needful" according to the circumstances.

INSTANCES WHERE NO AUTHORITY IMPLIED.

An authority to act for plaintiff is not to discharge a defendant before payment.

Savory v. Chapman, 3 P. & D. 604.

A solicitor has no implied authority to discharge a defendant from custody upon a ca. sa., to discharge from custody upon terms than a satisfaction of the judgment.

Cannop v. Challis, 2 Ex. 464; See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 78, s. 124.

The possession by a vendor's solicitor of an executed conveyance with the signed consideration money indorsed, is an authority to receive the purchase money.

Viney v. Chaplin, 3 De G. & J. 408; Ch.

A solicitor has no implied authority to purchase money belonging to his client due to him on mortgage, nor to sue from him for the purpose of investment.

Bourdillon v. Roche, 27 L. J. 622, Ch.

Viney v. Chaplin (sup.)

The solicitor in an action has no authority to settle an action on any terms than payment of the debt and costs, or to discharge a defendant from custody without receiving them.

Savory v. Chapman, 11 A. & E. 530;

Levi v. Abbott, 4 Ex. 580.

Nor can he, after judgment in the client, enter into an agreement on his part to postpone execution.

Lovegrove v. White, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 1.

A solicitor has no implied authority to compromise his client's credit to counsel by a promise to pay his fees so as to enable him to sue for them.

Mostyn v. Mostyn; Ex parte Burgh; Ch; 39 L. J. 780, Ch; 23 L. T. 2 are a solicitor brings an action without the authority of the plaintiff, the latter is entitled to the proceedings stayed without payment of costs.

Reynolds v. Howell, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 398.

Note.

An early case (Anon., 1 Salk. 88-89), it is laid down where an attorney takes upon him to appear, the law looks no further, but leaves the party to his own conduct. Robson v. Eaton (1 T. R. 62), a case, is inconsistent with the former, which may be considered as overruled. Mr. Justice Blackburn, ever, in Reynolds v. Howell (supra), expressed an opinion that if a plaintiff after action brought in his name by an attorney without authority, hears of it, does not repudiate it, he will be supposed to have authorized the attorney's act.

Solicitor has no implied authority to act as a party.

Illustration.

A and B were attorneys in partnership. A sum of £500 was paid by a client to A. (without the knowledge of B.) for the purpose of its being laid out on a business. The business of the firm was that of attorneys simply. Held, that B. was not liable to account for the above sum.

Harman v. Johnson, 2 E. & B. 61.

"I think," said Lord Campbell, "that an attorney, who is not a scrivener, . . . A scrivener holds the money put into his hands until he has means of laying it out; but this employment of a scrivener is not a consequence of his acting as attorney."

See Earl of Dundonald v. Masterman (L. Rep. 7 Eq. 504; St. Aubyn v. Smart (1b. 5 Eq. 183); and the remarks of Malins, V.C., in Plummer v. Gregory (L. Rep. 18 Eq. 632).

ARTICLE 37.

ADMISSION BY SOLICITORS.

As regards the ordinary routine of the admissions made by a solicitor are binding on the client, without proof that he expressly made such admissions. A solicitor, however, has no such implied authority to bind his co-solicitors.

Illustrations.

The following cases are admissions by the solicitor to the client:

An admission of the handwriting of an attesting witness: (Milward v. Temple, 1 Camp. 375.)
An admission to prevent the necessity of proving a fact at the time: (Young v. Wright, 1 Camp. 141.)

Admissions made relative to a cause during the pendency of negotiations on behalf of the defendant: (Gainsford v. Gummery, 2 Camb. 9.)

Where an agreement was to admit on the trial of this cause, it was allowed to be used on a new trial: (Ellon v. Larkins, 1 M. & Rob. 196.)

Where in a similar case (to 4) the solicitor retracted before the new trial, the agreement was admitted: (Doe v. Wetherell v. Bird, 7 C. & P. 6.)

The following case the admission was not binding on the client:

Admissions made in a letter by a solicitor who was afterwards solicitor in the cause: (Wagstaff v. Wilson, 4 B. & Ad. 339.)

Admissions made in the course of conversation but without any intent to dispense with proof: (Blackstone v. Wilson, 26 L. J. 229, Ex.)

Note.

Wm. Grant, M.R., says, in Fairlie v. Hastings (124): "As a general proposition, what one says, not upon oath, cannot be evidence against another man. The exception must arise out of some state of situation coupled with the declarations by one. An agent may undoubtedly, within the scope of his authority, bind the principal by his acts, and in many cases by his words. What agent has said may be what constitutes the agent of the principal, or the representations or admissions made may be the foundation of the agent to the agreement. Therefore if writing necessary by law, evidence must be admitted to that the agent did make that statement or admission. So with regard to acts done, the words with which those acts are accompanied frequently tend to determine their quality. The party, therefore, to be bound by the act must be affected by words."

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

INFRINGEMENT—INTERLOCUTORY DECISION.—In a suit to restrain the infringement of a patent relating to roller skates, the defendant moved for an injunction against the plaintiff until the hearing. Held (per James, L.J., with J.A., affirming the order of the Master of the Rolls, Baggallay, J.A., dissenting), that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction upon giving undertakings as to damages. Inasmuch as the plaintiff's trade was only a new one, there would be hardship in stopping it and requiring the plaintiff to give an undertaking as to damages compelling the plaintiff to rely upon the plaintiff's undertaking to keep an account of his sales and profits: (Plimpton v. Spiller, 35 L. T. S. 656. Ct. of App.)

APPLICATION MADE AFTER TRIAL TO THE CHAMBERS.—Where no application has been made to the judge at the trial, that judge nor any judge at chambers has jurisdiction under Order LV. to make an order as to costs upon application made after the trial, even fresh facts have come to light since the action was tried: (Baker and others v. Oakes, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671. Ex. Div.)

PATENT—NOVELTY—PRIOR PUBLICATION.—A description of an invention appearing in a provisional specification and omitted in the final specification must be presumed to be abandoned by the inventor, and, unless a full description, will not avoid a subsequent patent on the ground of prior publication: (Stones v. Todd, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661. Chanc. Div.)

UNCLAIMED STOCK AND DIVIDENDS IN THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

(Transferred to the Commission for the Reduction of the National Debt, and which will be paid to the persons respectively whose names are prefixed to each in three months, unless some other claimants sooner appear.)
LAWRENCE (Jno.), of Birch-lane, Esq., and STRACHAN (Jas. Morgan), of Loddington-street, Middlesex, Esq. One dividend on the sum of £1000 Three per Cent. Annuities (claimant, Geo. Arbuthnot, surviving acting executor of Jas. M. Strachan, deceased, who was the survivor of Messrs. Benjamin, of the Bank Exchange, rentman, £170 Three per Cent. Annuities. ## LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

Inquiries, as to the several Examinations and as to Admission on the Roll of the Supreme Court, as to being called to the Bar, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, should be addressed to the Editor (Students' Department).

THE growth of law students' societies throughout the country must be very gratifying to those who, believing in their value to law students, labour for their creation and prosperity. In another column we publish the annual report of the Liverpool Law Students' Association, which presents several satisfactory features: indeed, there is every reason to expect that this society will soon become one of the most important law students' societies in the country. This will be the more easily accomplished if Liverpool solicitors will give to it that hearty support which it thoroughly deserves. The formation of these associations represents so many efforts on the part of articled clerks to educate themselves in the important art of public speaking.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed to be delivered and held in the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, during the ensuing week: Monday, Conveyancing Class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock p.m.; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, ditto; Thursday, lecture on Equity, 6 to 7 o'clock p.m. Subscribers are not admitted to the hall after the lectures have commenced. Members of the society may attend the lectures.

IN another column we publish the prize essay written by a member of the Huddersfield Law Students' Society, the prize having been offered for competition under circumstances similar to those in the case of the Portsmouth Law Students Society, when Mr. Mills, of Southsea, was the successful essayist. The greater professional encouragement given to law students the better for the future of the Profession in general.

ARTICLES of clerkship, or assignments of articles of clerkship, dated on any day during January, must be enrolled and registered at the Petty Bag Office on or before the same days in the month of July next, and when articles or assignments are required to be, and are, enrolled and registered on any day during the month of January, they must be produced and entered at the Law Institution on or before the same day of the month of April next. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 8 and 9, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 7. Failure to comply with these statutory requirements often entails a loss of time upon articled students.

WHERE articles expire between the 9th April and 22nd May, candidates may be examined on the 24th and 25th April next; and if between the 21st May and 2nd Nov., may be examined on the 19th and 20th June next; or, of course, at any subsequent examination. Six weeks' notice at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of the month of examination.

IN case of the death of a principal during articles, fresh articles should always be entered into without loss of time. The time which elapses between the day of the death of the principal and the day of the date of fresh articles being entered into, does not count, so that the further articles must be for a time sufficient to make up for this loss of service, as well as for the unexpired term of the original articles of clerkship.

NOTICES for the final examination, and notices for admission on the roll of solicitors can be renewed within one week from the end of the month, for which such original notices have respectively been given. For further information see the Regulations of November 1875.

AN examination certificate is only available for admission on the roll of the Supreme Court within six months from its date, and must otherwise be specially enlarged by an order of the Master of the Rolls, which should be applied for at the Petty Bag Office.

DAYS appointed in 1877 for the Preliminary Examinations.—Wednesday 21st and Thursday 22nd February; Wednesday 16th and Thursday 17th May; Wednesday 11th and Thursday 12th July; Wednesday 24th and Thursday 25th October.

THE general rules and regulations as to the several examinations prior to admission on the roll of solicitors, as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, issued on the 2nd Nov. 1875, provide in effect "that if any solicitor of the Supreme Court, after having at any time taken out a stamped certificate, shall, for the space of a whole year from and after the expiration thereof, have neglected to renew the same for the following year, or has failed to obtain such a certificate within twelve months from the date of his admission on the Roll, the registrar shall not afterwards grant a certificate to such solicitor, except under an order of the Master of the Rolls, and for the purpose of obtaining such an order the applicant shall, six weeks before the application is intended to be made, give notice thereof as in the case of an original admission, and the affidavits in support of such application shall be filed at the Petty Bag Office, and a copy thereof shall at the same time be left with the clerk of the Petty Bag, to be delivered by him to the Registrar of Solicitors, and the order for such taking out or renewal, shall (if made) be drawn up on reading such affidavits, and an affidavit of such copies having been left and notices given. Upon an application to dispense with the required notice of intention to take out or renew a certificate, a summons must be served on the Registrar of Solicitors calling on him to shew cause within ten days why such taking out or renewal of certificate should not be allowed; and if no cause be shown to the satisfaction of the Master of the Rolls, he may make an order for allowing such certificate to be issued."

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

PRIZE ESSAY on the subject, "Do the changes effected by the recent Judicature and Appellate Acts constitute a reform in keeping with the requirements of the age?" Written by Mr. E. Welsh, a member of the above society, under the motto, "Foy et Devoir," the prize and award having been presented and made as reported in our issue of the 23rd ultimo, page 136:

Of all the changes witnessed by any generation of lawyers, probably none has been much greater than that introduced by the Acts which form the subject of this essay. Fortunate indeed, or unfortunate one is inclined to say, are the present members of the legal Profession in seeing in their days so total and startling a transformation as the one just achieved, by which the omnipotence of Parliament was never perhaps better exhibited. Old and venerable names famous in legal history disappear for ever; courts, which have stood the test and shocks of centuries are at once abolished; equity has changed places with law, and, instead of following, now precedes it, and the whole system of judicial procedure is revolutionised.

Alterations so vast and important as these must of necessity entail consequences equally vast and equally important, and, therefore, whilst fully admitting that the subject is immense, and that its treatment should therefore be of the most careful kind, it may, at the same time, be said that it is the duty of every present member of the legal profession carefully to enquire into the changes produced, and to judge, as well as he is able, in what degree they are consonant to the feeling and requirements of the age.

The essayist will necessarily have to deal—
1. With the old state of things, that obtained prior to the Acts;
2. With the changes now introduced; and
3. With the question contained in his subject.

When the old system of Judicature in England is considered, or rather, the different systems which had grown up, as it were, from the earliest times with the English kingdom and as part of the English constitution, it must be confessed that they were utterly devoid of anything like coherence or reciprocity. The old common law of England, rooted by the growth of ages and resting to a great extent on unwritten principles, with its precise and formal regulations, and its hard-and-fast lines, was established on the one hand, and on the other there was what was called the jurisdiction of "equity," not carrying out that word in its full and ordinary acceptation, but still tempering, as in the exercise of its ancient clerical character, the procedure of its stern and more unbending rival. Perhaps of no country could it ever have been said, as was said of our own, that the successful suitor on one side of the hall of justice was the unsuccessful one on the other; and yet this was so, from the fact that the common law courts ignored a large number of rights all powerful in the Court of Chancery, which, on the other hand, entirely disregarded the great and best feature of the common law system, viz., trial by jury. The practice of the two courts also was widely different—the one paring down the statement of either side to the narrowest possible issue, and with the utmost strictness, so as to cause a slight variance fatal, and its remedy being, in all cases except ejectment, money damages only; and the other, whilst its powers of injunction and discovery were of the greatest utility, allowing a more modern or freer style of stating the different sides of the question; however, unfortunately often degenerating into laxity and slovenliness.

It will be naturally supposed that, as litigation and inter-communication increased, and experience extended, a state like this could not be allowed to exist for accordingly efforts were made so far back to cope with the existing absurdity spreading evil. In that year commencing 1867, a commission was appointed to inquire into the working of the common law system, and in the year following commissioners were appointed to inquire into that of equity, and the report of these bodies pointed with remarkable clearness to the transfer, or blending of the jurisdiction of different courts into one harmonious whole.

Following on the reports of the above commissions, several Acts were passed partialising the powers of both the courts of common law and Chancery. To the former were given powers of discovery, of injunction, of allowing defences, and of relieving against forfeiture powers until then the peculiar character of the Court of Chancery; while this, on the other hand, was enabled to take evidence oral with common law questions arising in equity suits, to award damages, and to assist a jury.

But these alterations, like all partial ones, failed in their intended effect. The common law courts did not take kindly to the powers of injunction and allowing equitable defences, and the Court of Chancery hardly availed itself of the aid of the great feature of a common law jury—and a further commission was appointed in 1867 to examine into the combined powers of common law and equity. The report presented in 1869 was embodied in Hatherley's Bill, introduced in 1870 with amendments, and in Lord Selborne's Bill, passed (36 & 37 Vict. c. 65), and this, with the Act of 1875 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 77), and the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of the past session (39 & 40 Vict. c. 59), form together the Acts alluded to in the title of this essay, and the changes introduced which have now to be considered.

The great feature of the Acts, and one of the greatest changes introduced by them, is, in doubt, the consolidation of the Court of Chancery with the Superior Courts of common law, and the Courts of Admiralty, Probate, and Divorce, and the Pleas of Lancaster and Durham, and the mission of Assize, &c., into one Supreme Court to which is transferred all their officers, powers, and duties. The Supreme Court being divided into the Court of Appeal and the High Court of Justice, which latter is subdivided again into divisions, perpetuating the names of many of the ancient courts, and forming respectively Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, and Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Divisions. The suitor can now, therefore, with no difficulty in choosing his tribunal, for there is but one Superior Court of first instance to which to prefer his claim. Neither is there any danger of his time or opportunity being lost by reason of the different divisions; for, when these will severally deal with the matters brought before them, they are confined to the jurisdiction of these courts, and the names they bear, so that, for instance, the division of trusts is to be obtained in the Chancery Division, and marriages will be dissolved in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division; the very wide and generous powers of relief vested in the different divisions render any taking of the kind alluded to a matter of comparatively little or no importance. This result is attained very strongly with the risk formerly incurred by a plaintiff of bringing his action in that division which was either unsuited or powerless to do justice upon it, or else applied principles to his case to his claim; in either case entailing pain, expense, disappointment, and delay upon the unsuccessful litigant.

The ancient division of the legal year into terms was also a fruitful source of delay in England, for, although the actual sittings of the courts could not be and were not limited to terms, yet the impossibility of making applications of different kinds except during term, was long felt and frequently commented on under the old system. The recent Acts practically abolish terms, and provision is made for the continuance of trial of jury causes and issues throughout the year; extremely wide powers being given by 26 of the principal Act to the courts and judges to sit and act "at any time and at any place the transaction of business or the discharge of any duty."

Turning from the constitution and powers of the Supreme Court and its different divisions to the principles which are to govern the decisions upon the matters brought before them, the result is what might have been expected: a consolidated court must of necessity recognise and enforce in all its branches the same right give the same remedies; and here, therefore, arrive at that fusion of law and equity long , and, at length, accomplished. The old distinctions are swept entirely away; the words "legal" and "equitable" are now no longer at conflict with each other, but are, as it were, welded together in one. Each court and each division is now to be governed by the same principles, no matter what the subject for adjudication or what the name it bears. It follows from this as a natural corollary that, as formerly the rules of law and equity were often contradictory, one or the other must now have to give way, and this has been effected by the 25th section of the Act of 1873, which, after enacting specifically as to certain points of disagreement, strikes the key-note, as it were, of the change effected by the doctrine and Appellate Acts, by providing that generally in all matters not thereinbefore particularly mentioned in which there is any conflict of variance between the rules of equity and the rules of the common law, with reference to the same matter, the rules of equity shall prevail."

The changes effected by the recent Acts, however, are not confined alone to the constitution and regulation of the court and its branches or to general principles to be enforced, great and important as these doubtless are; but the modes dealing with the cases adjudicated on, whether in respect to claims, defences, or parties, are altered of a far wider and more comprehensive nature than was formerly the case.

The claim which forms the subject matter of an action was formerly, in common law trials, cut down to some specific question, frequently forming part of a far wider and larger subject, whilst in equity suits the whole question was inquired into and endeavoured to be settled. In future, however, of these modes may be carried out. Specific questions of claims may thus be dealt with, or the whole matter concluded. Provision is made for joinder of different causes of action, joint and several claims may be brought concurrently, the act of set-off is very greatly extended, so as to admit liquidated or unliquidated demands, and a defendant is allowed a free right of counterclaim so great as to admit of a verdict being given in favour in actions brought with a very distinct object.

Necessarily, also, a far wider latitude is allowed as to the parties to an action. Any person whose interests are in the slightest degree affected in the matter in question may be made a party to the action by either the plaintiff or defendant. Partners can be sued in the name of a firm, and the old Chancery rule of allowing a person to represent a class is admitted, and, far more than this, the parties to an action may be added to, struck out, or changed, with very much less facility than was formerly the case. Mistakenly on the part of the plaintiff, the birth, death, or death of an interested person, alteration of claims by plaintiff or defendant, or claims contributed by a defendant, are all henceforth allowed as good grounds for a change in the parties to an action. All these new regulations, however, with regard to the subject matter of an action, or the parties thereto, tend in the one direction of enabling the tribunal before whom tried, in contrast to the ancient multiplicity of trials and lengthened litigation, to decide once and for all upon all the different matters possible to be disputed, and to execute substantial and final justice between the parties.

While these advantages accrue from the order of things the proceedings are not, as might be supposed, rendered more cumbersome and slow. On the contrary, simplicity is aimed at, the proceedings, from the writ downwards, are rendered far less complex than was formerly the case. The common law form of writ of summons is adopted, short and pithy forms of indorsement in different cases are provided, and the evils of long and often needlessly prolix "bill" and "plea" are to a great extent avoided. On the other hand, the circuitous and time-honoured mode of common law pleading, with its almost unending carelessness, is also abolished. "Rejoinder" and "sur-rejoinder," "rebuttal" and "re-rebuttal," alike disappear, and a simple, concise, and thoroughly business-like system of statements of claim and defence respectively, drawn up in modern and terse language, and therewith a reply and joinder of issue, which, under a certain length, are to be printed, as in the old Chancery procedure, forming, in the majority of cases, the whole of the pleadings. Appearances in order to gain time are also met by an amendment of the principle of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1855, so that now a defendant to a writ indorsed with a claim for a liquidated sum, even if he appears, is compelled to show a good defence or good cause why judgment should not be given notwithstanding appearance.

Very important change also effected is that proceedings in an action down to the point already reached may be taken in what is called a district registry. This provision is indeed a very great modification of that principle of the localisation of jurisdiction which has been carried out to a considerable extent in the ever-increasing powers and duties conferred and imposed upon County Courts and County Court judges. Instead, therefore, of commencing all proceedings in the Superior Court in London, any action except probate may be commenced by a plaintiff, wherever resident, in any district registry, and if not removed on defendant's application, may be continued there down to notice of trial or judgment by default, and the registrar is to have the same jurisdiction as a master of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer Divisions, and can appoint a deputy for a certain period. The great majority of district registrars appointed under the Acts are registrars of County Courts, and their districts the districts of these courts.

The powers of the judges with regard to matters more closely connected with the trial of actions have been considerably increased. The right of discovery is very much simplified, for whereas formerly Chancery, on the one hand, allowed great latitude in interrogatories, often the cause of needless expense being incurred, at common law the right was greatly restricted. Interrogatories may now be put by either party, but provision is made for throwing their cost, if improper, on the party in fault. Injunctions can now be granted in all cases where just and convenient, and the refined distinctions formerly drawn by the Court of Chancery are done away with. The system also of trial by jury, once alien to the nature of equity, is extended to all actions, as also is the case with regard to oral evidence, which prevails now over the old Chancery practice of fighting a suit with affidavits. The power of compulsory reference is largely increased, and provision is also made for referring complicated actions to an official referee, an entirely new office, or a special referee, appointed by the parties, who, in either case, is to have the same powers as a judge, but whose decision is placed much more under the review of the court than was formerly the case.

Formerly, at a trial in London or Middlesex, or at the assizes, the judge was not considered to constitute a court, nor would he decide on the law of the case, but only try the issues of fact; by the recent Acts a judge or commissioner of assize constitutes a court, and, as such, is able to decide questions of law raised at the trial, and every action and proceeding in the High Court of Justice, and all business arising out of the same is, by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, to be heard, as far as practicable and convenient, before a single judge; but a divisional court, consisting of two or more members, is to deal with appeals from inferior courts and motions for new trial, which may be of one question only, without interfering with the decision upon any other question, and execution may now follow judgment without waiting the fourteen days formerly allowed. By these regulations not only is the power of the judges considerably increased, but there is also an important saving of judicial force effected, thus allowing a speedier conducting of litigation.

With regard to appeals, the procedure is at once simplified and extended. To the Court of Appeal is transferred all the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, including bankruptcy appeals, the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Lancaster, the Court of the Lord Warden of the Stannaries, the Exchequer Chamber, and the Privy Council in Admiralty and Lunacy appeals. In all cases the mode of appeal in this court is now uniform, being by motion and the jurisdiction of the court is not limited as formerly in common law appeals, but is extended to all judgments or orders, except when by consent or relating solely to costs, or in criminal appeals, or from inferior courts unless by leave. A strong court of appeal is constituted, which is especially strengthened by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, and now consists of five ex officio and six ordinary members, with power for two further judges to be appointed, on certain changes occurring in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

It was first intended by the Judicature Act of 1873 to abolish the right of appealing to the House of Lords or the Judicial Committee. The appellate jurisdiction of the House of Peers had been long exercised, and took its rise in the ancient court called "Aula Regis," established by William the Conqueror. This court, which comprised the greater barons of Parliament, formed a kind of appeal court, or court of advice, and on its dissolution or division, in the time of Edward I., when the barons' officers formed other tribunals the barons themselves continued to hear appeals. This tribunal, in the "honour and conscience" of whose members, according to Blackstone, the law reposed confidence, could always command the assistance and advice of the common law judges, and its jurisdiction extended to Scotch and Irish appeals.

Of late years inconvenience had been greatly felt on account of the inability of this appeal court to sit during the prorogation or dissolution of Parliament, and although a commission appointed in 1872 recommended its retention, there was a section in the principal Act abolishing its appellate jurisdiction, together with that of the Privy Council. This provision, with respect to any rate to the House of Lords, met with strong opposition, especially on the part of the Bar and solicitors of Scotland, and after having been postponed by the Act of 1875 is now repealed by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act.

Provision, however, is now made for the better regulation of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords by the appointment of two lords of appeal in ordinary, who are to have seats in that House during office only, by providing that the Appellate Court is to consist of three at the least, and by enabling the court to sit during the prorogation of Parliament or after its dissolution by her Majesty's permission.

Appeals may, therefore, still be carried from the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords, and whilst in this way the ancient Appellate Jurisdiction of the Peers has been preserved, it may be supposed and hoped that the alterations alluded to will effect a great improvement in the conduct of such appeals, give stability to the tribunal, and render it worthier of being the Final Court of Appeal for the three great divisions of this kingdom.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is also to be strengthened by the attendance of certain of the English archbishops and bishops on the hearing of ecclesiastical cases.

The principal changes effected by the recent Judicature and Appellate Acts have thus been briefly considered, and it remains to inquire whether they constitute a reform in keeping with the requirements of the age.

The character and habits of the times in which we live certainly contrast very strongly with those connected with the times when many of the recently abrogated principles and regulations were laid down and prescribed. Whether attention be directed to the population, the wealth and commerce, the spread of education and civilisation, or the facilities for inter-communication, which now characterise our country and its people, we are alike struck with the great rate of increase which meets us on every hand. What was once but forest or moor is now ground thickly populated or the scene of great manufactures. Our home population, ever rapidly increasing, in spite of emigration, is far beyond the remotest ideas of our ancestors. The invention and extensive use of all kinds of machinery, combined with the modern discoveries of science, and the freedom of commerce, has elevated our country to an unheard-of state of affluence and prosperity which, in its turn, has contributed to the vast extension of education and the gentler arts, and to the widely-increased enjoyment of the luxuries of life. New descriptions of property have arisen, and new rights and liabilities connected therewith, while the locomotive engine and the electric telegraph have brought all parts of the kingdom together, and thus welded and assimilated the people and their customs. The artisan classes of our community now enjoy comforts to which the noble of the land were formerly strangers, and share in pursuits and recreations to them unknown.

And if the past centuries have contributed to these results, it cannot be doubted but that the 19th century has in its rate of progress far outstripped, as it is still outstripping, the others. The necessary consequence is that far more is now possible to be achieved in a lifetime than formerly, and life is to a great extent accelerated. This being the case, it is but natural that reforms should be constantly being made in ancient institutions, laws, and customs, in order to render their powers more extensive, to quicken their action, to remove antiquated and useless obstructions, and to render them better fitted for the age in which we live; and such of them as cannot show good cause for their existence, or a good and solid foundation on which to rest, are by the searching power of a free press and public opinion soon discovered, attacked, and uprooted.

The changes recently effected in our system of Judicature form a case exactly in point, and they are, in the writer's opinion, clearly changes which carry out, more or less, the great and important object which prompted them, viz., the rendering of that system more in accordance with the requirements of modern times. A good and sound scheme of Judicature should be simple and yet comprehensive—swift and yet sure—and the tribunals of a country should be ever such as that in them the inhabitants in that country can repose the fullest and most perfect trust and confidence. The scheme should be simple—so that no difficulty may be experienced in having recourse thereto, and so that the suitor may, without impediment and at the smallest cost, carry his plaint before the court and obtain the adjudication desired; and yet comprehensive—so as to include in one action every possible matter in dispute, and every interested party. It should, further, be swift in its action—so that the course of justice be not delayed and its power weakened by the escape of the defaulter; and yet at the same time as to set vexed questions at rest for ever, and to carry out the decrees of its ministers with unerring vigilance; and, lastly, the tribunals must be trustworthy, so that those within their jurisdiction, whether litigants or not, may respect them, their officers, and their decisions, and resort to them without fear.

The recent changes which have been specified tend towards all these ends. The consolidation of the different jurisdictions in one Supreme Court, the assimilation of the principles governing its decisions, and the very great simplification of practice and procedure, are in the direction of that simplicity, which, as has been said, is so desirable in jurisprudence, while comprehensiveness is aimed at and secured by the wide powers given with respect to claims, defences, and parties, and the other regulations as to discovery, injunctions, and the wording of judgments, &c., to which reference has been made; wide and extensive indeed are these powers, and, though not perhaps enabling our judges to imitate altogether the adjudication of the renowned Haroun Al-Raschid, famed for his judicial dicta, at any rate they will very greatly assist them to carry out the remarkable dictum of Lord Chief Justice Willes, in Collins v. Blanton (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. p. 369), viz., "Est boni judicis ampliare jurisdictionem," and I say, "Est boni judicis ampliare justitiam."

The Judicature and Appellate Acts will also accelerate the wheels of justice, not only by preventing the lengthening out of many causes, whether by a factious and spurious defence, simply in order to gain time, and the improper exercise of the right of appeal—in the former case by rendering such an appearance useless and by continuous sittings, and in the latter by providing a strong Appeal Court and a speedier trial for appeals—but also by providing machinery for, and enabling all the steps in a county cause down to trial to be taken at the very doors of the suitors by means of the district registries; and, further, by the provision for immediate execution. At the same time, the uncertainty of the law, to which the term "glorious" is certainly misapplied, is greatly lessened by the amalgamation of the courts, and the simplicity and finality of the new procedure, which will most certainly close most of those loopholes which it has been hitherto the endeavour and delight of the promoters of rotten and fictitious claims and defences to discover.

And, finally, the public confidence in the judicial office and dicta will undoubtedly increase by reason of the great and wide powers of the Court of First Instance, the very strong nature of the Court of Appeal, and, especially by the enactment with regard to the Court of Final Appeal, now reinforced as to its judicial wisdom and experience, strengthened as to its quorum, prolonged as to its sittings, and yet still retaining all that prestige and those especial excellencies which have done so much to secure, amid the recent alterations, the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Peers.

In fine, therefore, looking at the changes introduced by, and the admirable ends aimed at in, the Judicature and Appellate Acts, it must be conceded that the recent great reforms in our legal system are a strong, a praiseworthy, and a successful attempt to grapple with the faults formerly existing, and to constitute a system of judicature more fitted to the requirements of the times. No doubt there may be those who hold that these changes do not go far enough in the direction of reform; an opinion not, perhaps, shared in greatly by those whose business it is to fathom the depths of the Acts and rules, and to measure the alterations introduced thereby, and an opinion which will, no doubt, be further decreased as the new system, with the aid of such further regulations as may prove to be required, emerges from the present transition period, with that homogeneous and complete character, which was the intent and object of its framers; for the judges of our country have added further honour to their "unsullied ermine" by the readiness, care, and labour which they have evinced in adapting themselves to the changes introduced by the Legislature, and in carrying into effect the spirit of the Acts. If, in spite of this, the recent block in the business of the courts is pointed to as a vicious result of the late legislation, it may be asked, who, knowing anything of legal reforms, or of legal systems, would expect for one instant that the measure and scope of the recent changes could be grasped in a moment or matured in a few months? And, without doubt, that unfortunate block, caused in great measure by the more extensive resort to litigation, consequent on the Acts, will by the acceleration of the trial of appeals be now ere long removed and its reproach taken away.

Instead, therefore, of carping needlessly at the slight defects and shortcomings inseparable from the conception and perfection of a great system of legal reform, rather shall it be said, that if, in the words of the old maxim, "Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium," that end is greatly served by the vides "that as far as possible all matters in controversy may be completely and finally determined, and all multiplicity of legal proceedings avoided;" that "the changes effected by the recent Judicature and Appellate Acts" are alike worthy of the minds who framed them, of the free and equal laws which they affect, and of the judicial bench which is to carry them into force, and that they certainly do, in the words of the subject of this essay, "constitute a reform in keeping with the requirements of the age."

BOLTON ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

THE second meeting of this society for the present session was held in the Law Society's Rooms, Wood-street, on Wednesday, the 3rd Jan. inst. Mr. W. F. Chambers took the chair. An interesting essay on "Legal Education, especially as to Articled Clerks," was read by Mr. T. R. Haslam. The question debated afterwards was, "Should the Landlord's Remedy by Distress be Abolished?" Mr. G. J. French opened the debate in the affirmative, and was supported by Mr. J. T. Cooper. Mr. Rennington and Mr. Haslam advocated the negative side of the question, which, when put to the meeting, was decided in the negative by a majority of eight.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the general meeting of this society, held at the Law Institution on Tuesday last, the hon. secretary, Mr. Indermaur, read the usual report, showing, amongst other things, that there were now on the society's roll 230 members. Several motions, greatly affecting the rules of the society, were, on the motion of the secretary, carried, notably one allowing all solicitors, articled clerks of solicitors, and clerks who have been articled to solicitors, barristers, and members or students of any of the Inns of Court or any of the universities to be qualified for election as ordinary members. This, of course, will give to the society a far greater scope than it has hitherto had, as up to the present time all members have had in some way to be connected with the Incorporated Law Society. Another alteration carried was one allowing of addresses and lectures to be delivered at the society's meetings, at the discretion of the committee, and also that the subjects to be discussed by the society in future are to be alternately legal and general in their nature. The secretary stated that all of these alterations met with the approval of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society.

LEEDS LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

MR. W. T. S. DANIEL, Q.C., one of the judges of the Leeds County Court, has accepted the presidency of this society.

LIVERPOOL LAW STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION.

THE first annual meeting of this association was held on Monday, the 8th inst., at the Law Association Rooms, Cork-street, Henry Cairncross Duncan, Esq., president of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool, in the chair. There were 35 members present.

The report of the committee was read by the Secretary, and, on the motion of Mr. Millar, seconded by Mr. Thompson, was unanimously adopted.

The Chairman then addressed the meeting, congratulating the members on the flourishing state of the association, as evidenced by the report of the committee. He also pointed out the cause of the failure of these associations in general from the interest in the proceedings falling off, and advised members to attend the meetings regularly, even at the cost of a little personal inconvenience.

A vote of thanks to the chairman for his kindness in presiding was moved by Mr. Rogers, seconded by Mr. Imlach, and carried unanimously. The chairman then retired, having other engagements to fulfil. Mr. Rutherford was called to the chair, and the election of officers for the year and other business of a formal nature was proceeded with. The subject for debate was adjourned to the next meeting, owing to the lateness of the hour, and the meeting then broke up. The following is the report of the committee:

The committee have great pleasure in submitting the following report of the year's proceedings, as it augurs well for the future success of the association:—

In Jan. 1876, a meeting was held at the Law Library, Cook-street, by a few articled clerks, at which it was resolved that a society to be called "Liverpool Law Students' Association" should be formed. Subsequent meetings were held, at which the rules of the association were drawn up and officers were appointed. The inaugural meeting was held on Feb. 28, W. G. Bateson, Esq., in the chair, on which occasion an address was delivered by W. B. Kennedy, Esq., barrister-at-law, on the objects and advantages of law students' associations in general.

From that date up to the close of the first session, in June, six meetings were held, with an average attendance of twenty members. In the discussions that took place on these occasions nine members on an average took part.

The second session commenced on the 2nd continued until the end of December, during time there were seven meetings, with an attendance of seventeen members, seven on an average taking part in each debate.

It will be noticed that the average attendance of members and the average number of speakers in the second session that in the first. I were however, as a whole, much better in session, owing no doubt to members having more confidence, and consequently speaking.

The association has seventy-three members considering the short time it has been in existence very satisfactory. The committee, however, taking into account the number of articled clerks in Liverpool, the number of members above larger, and wish to impress strongly upon the desirability of getting their friends to join the association.

The state of the finances of the association appear from the treasurer's report, from which it is observed that there is a balance of £20 8s credit. As some of the members only join during the year, it is thought desirable to call upon them to pay contributions, as the funds of the association are in a flourishing condition. The committee trust that the next meeting will meet with the approval of the association.

The committee observe with pleasure that Rogers, a member of the association, at the examination of candidates in November last, won the Clement's Inn prize; and also that J. P. Pride, another member of the association, the same examination, would have been an honorary distinction if he had not been over six years of age.

The committee beg to remind members of the interest and well-being of the association depend upon the interest in its proceedings being uniformly maintained, and would be obliged by members sending in notices questions suitable for discussion.

F. MARTON HULL, Chairman.
THEODORE MELHUISE, Secy.

PLYMOUTH, STONEHOUSE, AND POET LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at the Freemasons' Hall, Plymouth, on Friday, the 12th inst. The following subject was discussed: "Are we sold by a trader in the ordinary course of business on a Sunday, and the purchaser afterwards promises to pay therefor, can the trader maintain an action for the price?"

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

THIS society will meet at Clement's Inn Strand, on Wednesday evening next (17th inst.) when Mr. J. T. Davies will preside.

Motions will be brought forward, one reference to the establishment of a prize called the "Union Prize," to be competed for by members of societies in union, and another formation of a law library in connection with the society. The question on the paper for discussion is "That Bar Students and Articled Clerks be educated together and pass the same examinations," will be opened by Mr. Slade Esq.

The thirteenth annual inaugural meeting will be held at Clement's Inn Hall on Monday the 22nd Jan. 1877, upon which occasion Mr. Forsyth, Esq., Q.C., LL.D., M.P., has kindly consented to preside. The following gentlemen among those who have already promised to attend and take part in the proceedings: Mr. Serjt. Simon, M.P., A. G. Marten, Esq., M.P., The Hon. Dudley Campbell, and Charley, Esq., D.C.L., M.P. The committee are pleased to see at this meeting any persons interested in the question of the education of students.

QUERIES.

ARTICLES—EXPIRATION OF DURING MINOR AMINATION.—If an articled clerk's term of service should expire before he were 21, would the period between the expiration of his articles and the time of his attaining that age, be any bar to his admission and admission as a solicitor when he attained that age? For example, supposing an articled clerk's term of service terminated in Feb. next, and he attained the age of 21 until the following July, that fact bar him from examination and admission?

FINAL EXAMINATION BEFORE EXPIRATION OF SERVICE.—QUESTIONS AS TO DUE SERVICE.—If a person articled for five years, which will expire May 14 next, and intend to apply for final examination in April next. You will observe that, in the meantime, as to due service of articles of clerkship, the question is, "have you served the whole time of your articles; if not, state the reason." Now, I shall have served the whole time of my articles at the time of giving the notice, and I should, therefore, know what, in your opinion, is the correct answer to the question. It would, of course, not be correct to say "yes," but would it be right to say "I have served the whole time, from the commencement of my articles to the present date, at the office of the solicitor to whom I am articled carries on his business?"

[Yes, your answer should be in the foregoing terms.]

J. HOUNSELL, Esq., Surgeon, Bridport, Dorset, writes:—"I consider BURTON'S NERVE-PAIN EXTRACT a valuable remedy. Very severe cases under my treatment have been found to be permanent relief. I recommend its use to the Profession and to the public to all who suffer from toothache."

YARMOUTH QUARTER SESSIONS.

Monday, Jan. 1.

Before SIMMS REEVE, Esq., Recorder.

VICH GUARDIANS (apps.) v. CHURCHWARDENS
OVERSEERS OF GREAT YARMOUTH (resps.).

as to the Poor Law Amendment Act 1876.

was the first case under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, and was an appeal by the Guardians against an order for the removal of a pauper named Sarah Ann Elizabeth Goddard from Yarmouth Workhouse.

Wrenfordsley and Poyser, instructed by W. B. Day, appeared for the appellants.

oper and Blofield, instructed by F. Danby, appeared for the respondents.

oper, in opening the case, said it was before the Guardians of the Poor of Ipswich, appellants, and the Churchwardens and Overseers of Great Yarmouth, respondents, in the appellants appealed against an order of magistrates of Yarmouth for the removal of Ann Elizabeth Goddard, aged 18, single in, daughter of John and Maria Goddard, Yarmouth to Ipswich, made on the 17th 1876. The respondents based their case

39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, ss. 34 and 35 (the Poor Amendment Act 1876). Sect. 34 provided that when any person shall have resided for a period of three years in any parish in such manner under such circumstances in each of such years as to be deemed to be settled therein until he shall be a settlement in some other parish by a residence, or otherwise, provided that the in respect of the settlement acquired this section shall not be made upon the evidence of the person to be removed without such as the justices or court shall be satisfied." He should be able to prove the father of the pauper, John Goddard, at 12, Church-lane, St. Matthew, Ipswich, 1870 to 1873. It was a continuous residence mainly more than three years, as four children were born during the time, which would be above that period. The 35th section provided that no person shall be deemed to have a settlement from any other person, by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except the case of a wife from her husband, and of a child under the age of 16, which shall take the settlement of its father, or of its mother, as the case may be, up to 16, and shall retain the settlement so taken until he shall acquire another." The girl in questioned with her father when she attained the age of 16. She was now 18 years of age, and had no other settlement. The object of the appeal, no doubt, was to get rid of the difficulty of derivative settlement. Formerly, if the settlement of the father were not proved, one could go back to the grandfather, but now it could only come from the father or widowed mother. The girl became chargeable to the union in Yarmouth on the 19th June 1874. She was then with her parents, and was subject to their control. The parents were in a state of distress, and the girl was removed to the workhouse. Inquiries were made and it was discovered that the father had lived in the appellants' house, and an order was made for her removal.

On the appeal were that the provisions of the Act were not retrospective, and that it did not apply, as the settlement was acquired by the passing of the Act.

Wrenfordsley said he contended that sect. 34 was not retrospective, and that sect. 35 did not apply at all. That section was as to derivative settlement. The father never had a settlement of which the pauper could derive any benefit until the Act came into operation, and if not retrospective he could have no settlement behalf of the respondents, Maria Goddard, mother of the pauper; Charles Hastings, builder, Church-lane, Ipswich; Mr. W. Bantoft, wine merchant, Ipswich; and Eliza Scofield, Church-lane, who were called to prove that John Goddard and his family resided at 12, Church-lane, Ipswich, four years.—Thomas Blythe, master of Yarmouth Workhouse, proved that the girl had been chargeable since June 19th, 1874, and was subject to epileptic fits.

Wrenfordsley said the case was an extremely important one not only as affecting Ipswich and Yarmouth, but was a serious one to the whole community. For the first time a recorder was asked to construe the meaning of this most important Act. If he succeeded in convincing the recorder upon the question, then he presumed that the respondents would ask for a case, and that the recorder would grant it, and if it was against him he should also ask for a case.

Sect. 34 was a remarkable one, dealing with the vexed question of the law of settlement.

Before this Act the question was very complex, and there was good reason for the Legislature to interfere and simplify it. The solicitor who instructed him (Mr. W. B. Ross, clerk to the Ipswich Guardians) was a gentleman of very great experience and authority on the Poor

Law, and he thought this section was intended to apply only to Ireland. To him (Wrenfordsley) this section was rather incomplete and ambiguous. Corresponding sections in previous Acts were closed with an important proviso, which was here wanting. Reference to previous Acts would assist in understanding this one, and in sect. 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, it is stated: "Be it enacted from and after the passing of this Act no person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person from any parish in which such person shall have resided for the five years next before." It was the absence of the words "next before" which caused the difficulty with which the court had to deal.

The Recorder asked Mr. Wrenfordsley if he seriously contended that a person might have lived two years and eleven months in a place before the passing of this Act, and the one month after brought him within its action?

Wrenfordsley said that was his contention, or otherwise the action of the Act must have been postponed for three years. It surely was not meant that the Act was to be retrospective, and that one should go back two years to get the settlement of three years. The respondents sought not only to make the Act retrospective but also to give it a relation back. If the court were to hold with this, it would give power of removal which would almost change the face of our workhouse system, and would give power to go back ten or twelve years to find a settlement. It was important to give the Act effect, and that could not be done by doing that which was never intended, and it certainly was not intended to jump back from 1876 to 1873 to fix a settlement. If that were so, we should have officers going from one workhouse to another to find out anyone who had resided three years in one parish. His contention was, that the intention of the Act was, that the term of three years' settlement might be commenced before it came into force, and completed any time after its passing on the 6th Aug. 1876. On this point Mr. Ross had written to the Local Government Board, and the reply was that as at present advised the board were of opinion the section had not a retrospective operation so far as regards the acquisition of the settlement. It seemed to them to confer the settlement on and from the date of the passing of the Act, but not before, though it conferred the settlement in respect of a residence which may have been completed at any time previously.

The Recorder.—Who wrote that letter?

Wrenfordsley: It is signed by no less a person than Mr. Fry—[loud laughter]—one of the luminaries of the Local Government Board. Wrenfordsley continued: Section 35 abolished the law of derivative settlement except in certain cases. He contended that the father had no settlement in Ipswich under this Act, and that being so the daughter could not derive any settlement. Therefore he submitted that this section did not apply at all.

Poyser argued against the 35th section applying in this case. He granted for the sake of argument that the words "shall have resided for three years" were retrospective, but contended that the further words of the section must be considered, and they were "shall be deemed to be settled" not "shall be deemed to have been settled" and therefore they could not be retrospective. As to the settlement, he contended that though it may have been earned before the passing of the Act, it was not conferred until the date of the Act, August, 1876. Consequently, when the daughter attained the age of 16, her father had gained no settlement, and therefore she could not derive any. In support of his argument, he (Poyser) quoted the cases of Reg. v. The Parish of St. Sepulchre (28 L. J. 187, M.C.); and Reg. v. The Guardians of St. Mary, Whitechapel (12 Q. B. 127).

Cooper, in reply, contended that the 34th section was retrospective. He thought the letter referred to by Mr. Wrenfordsley was in his favour. He called attention to sect. 36, which is as follows:—"The provisions regarding the settlement shall not apply to any pauper removed under any order of removal, or without such order, under the provisions on that behalf contained in the Union Chargeability Act 1865, before the passing of this Act, or in receipt of non-resident relief lawfully given, or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be proceeding at the passing of this Act." In support of his case he quoted The Overseers of the Township of Preston v. The Overseers of the Township of Blackburn (32 L. J., N. S., 180, M. C.).

The Recorder, in delivering judgment, said that the question he had to decide was whether the order made by the Yarmouth magistrates as to the removal of this girl was good or not. It turned upon sections 34 and 35, and the main question was whether the residence of a person was retrospective or not—whether the three years' residence must have been before August, 1876. He then traversed the facts of the case as given in evidence. The question was whether the pauper belonged to the Union of Ipswich or not, and he was of opinion that she did, and that the words of the 34th section were retrospective. It appeared to him an absurdity to hold that the whole of the time for gaining settlement was to run from the passing of the Act, and an equal absurdity that a portion must be passed before and the remainder after, and he must, therefore, hold that the section was retrospective; he consequently affirmed the order for removal, and would grant a case for a higher court as to whether section 34 was retrospective.

Wrenfordsley applied for a case on both sections, which the Recorder granted.

Cooper applied for costs, which were allowed.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

RATING OF RAILWAYS—IMPROVEMENT RATE LOCAL ACT—PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS.—By the

Walsall Improvement and Market Act 1848, commissioners had power to levy an improvement rate within a district not comprising the whole municipal borough as afterwards constituted, but the Act contained a proviso that the occupiers of land used as a railway should be assessed in proportion only of one-fourth part of the net value. The Public Health Acts 1872 and 1875 formed the whole municipal borough of Walsall into an urban sanitary district. Held, that the assessment ought to be made under the local Act, and not under the Public Health Acts: (London and North-Western Railway v. Overseers of Walsall, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 626. Q.B.)

COMPANY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PARCEL RULES—STAMPED AND UNSTAMPED PARCELS—UNDUE PREFERENCE.—The M.G.W.E.

Co. adopted two scales of charges for carriage of parcels by their line. One of the scales varied in amount according to the weight of the parcel carried and according to the distance; the other scale, though it varied according to the weight, made no reference to the distance. The parcels to be carried by latter scale were not to exceed particular dimensions and a certain value. They were required to be prepaid by having adhesive stamps affixed to them. The parcels were carried from the receiving offices of the company at Dublin to the terminus, and then by the Messrs. W., the company's agents, who are paid, in common with all the other carriers employed in Dublin by the company, 1d. per parcel for cartage of stamped parcels. This arrangement was due to an agreement by which Messrs. W. undertook to carry all stamped parcels gratuitously in consideration of receiving 1d. for every unstamped parcel; for other towns stamped parcels were charged 2d.

for collection or delivery. Held, that under the circumstances the company were not guilty of undue preference, although the applicant had the same trouble in collecting or delivering parcels whether they were stamped or unstamped: (Robertson v. Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 636. Rail Com.)

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—MISDIRECTION.—The appellants were colliery owners, and had a siding adjoining the respondents' line, on to which the respondents were in the habit of bringing the appellants' empty trucks from their line, which the appellants removed as they thought fit. The respondents brought such trucks at any time without notice to the appellants. On a Saturday, after working hours at the appellants' colliery, they brought on to the siding a truck loaded to such a height that it would not pass under a bridge which crossed the siding. On the following Monday, before daylight, and before work was resumed, they pushed on to the siding other trucks, which pushed the loaded truck against the bridge and damaged it. In an action for the damage so done, Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that there was evidence on which a jury might find the appellants guilty of contributory negligence, but, reversing the judgment of the court below, that the judge had misdirected the jury in not telling them that if the respondents could have avoided the accident by reasonable care and diligence, they were still liable, notwithstanding the negligence of the appellants: (Bradley and another v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637. H. of L.)

INSURANCE COMPANY—AMALGAMATION—TRANSFER OF LIABILITIES—ANNUITANTS.—An insurance company, which by its deed of settlement had power to transfer its business to another company, granted an annuity by a policy signed and sealed by three of its directors, which declared that the stocks and funds of the company should during the life of the annuitant be liable to pay the annuity. Fifteen years afterwards the company transferred its business to another company, in accordance with the power contained in the deed of settlement. Both companies being in liquidation, the annuitant claimed to prove against the transferring company: Held, that the omission from the policy of any reference to the deed of settlement did not distinguish the case from Hort's case (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 766; L. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 307), and that the annuitant could only prove against the transferee company: (Dowse's case, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 653. Ct. of App.)

WINDING-UP—CONTRIBUTORY—PAST MEMBERS—COMPULSORY REGISTRATION.—The 38th section of the Companies' Act 1862, which makes past members liable to be placed on the list of contributories, applies to companies compulsorily registered under the 209th section of the Act, as well as to companies formed under the Act: (Ramsay's case, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654. Ct. of App.)

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

MINES—ADJACENT OWNERS—NATURAL USER—WATER.—The appellants and the respondents were leasees under the same landlord of the minerals under two adjacent parts of the same estate. The soil over the mines was in its natural condition impervious to water. The respondent so worked his mine that the surface of the ground cracked and sank, and the rainfall and surface water flowed through the fissures, and found its way into the appellants' mine, which was at a lower level than the respondent's. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the respondent was not liable for the damage so done in the natural course of user of his own land: (Wilson v. Waddell, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 639. H. of L.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—HUSBAND AND WIFE—JOINT POWER OF APPOINTMENT—CONTRACT BY HUSBAND TO SELL FEE—DEATH OF HUSBAND—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.—Property stood limited to such uses as A. and his wife should jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, remainder to A. in fee. A. contracted to sell the property to B. The agreement stated that the property stood limited "to such uses as A. and his wife should jointly appoint," and that A. would "procure a proper assurance of the premises to the purchaser to be executed by all necessary parties." A. died before completion, having devised the property to trustees upon trusts for sale. Held, that B. was entitled to specific performance, with compensation in respect of the wife's life interest: (Barker v. Cox, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 662. V.C.B.)

LIVERPOOL PASSAGE COURT.

ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Jan. 6 and 8.

(Before T. H. BAYLIS, Q.C. and Nautical Assessors).

THE NORTHERN EMPIRE.

Towage or Salvage.

THIS case was one of some importance to persons engaged in the shipping trade in Liverpool. It was a claim by the owners and crew of the steam tug Fiery Cross against the ship Northern Empire. Kennedy, instructed by J. L. Law, appeared for the Fiery Cross.

Potter and Roscos, instructed by Bateson and Co., for the Northern Empire.

The Northern Empire, a large timber laden ship, whose value, including cargo and freight, was agreed as being about £8000, on Nov. 2 was being towed from the Alfred Dock, Birkenhead, to the Canada Dock. The ship broke loose from the tugs, and after coming into collision with the City of Berlin, and being made fast, again broke loose. She then drifted, under the influence of a flood tide and a light westerly breeze, across the river to the neighbourhood of the Plunkington Bank, where her two tugs were made fast to her starboard and port sides, and the Fiery Cross also coming up towed her midway from the bank. For this service salvage was claimed by the Fiery Cross.

The COURT held that there was such an amount of peril to the Northern Empire in the position in which she was when taken in tow by the Fiery Cross that the services of the latter were more than towage, and that she was entitled to a salvage reward, and she was therefore awarded £80, in addition to £12 10s., the amount paid into court for purely towage services.

CHARTER-PARTY—DAYS ALLOWED FOR LOADING—STIFFENING COAL DEMURRAGE—MASTER'S LIEN.—Defendants chartered plaintiff's ship to carry a cargo to Callao. By the charter-party the ship was "to be loaded at the average rate of 75 tons per clear working day . . . Stiffening coal, if required, to be supplied at ship's expense at the rate of 40 tons per clear working day after written notice is given to the charterers' agent of its being required, but all days on which stiffening coal is taken on board, or the ship is detained for the same, to be excluded in the computation of the said working days allowed for loading . . . Demurrage to be paid for each day beyond the said days allowed for loading and discharging respectively at the rate of 3d. per registered ton per day. The master to have a lien on the cargo for all freight and demurrage due under this agreement . . . All liability of the charterers under this agreement shall cease as soon as the cargo is on board . . . All questions, whether of short delivery, demurrage, or otherwise, are to be settled with the manager or agents of the charterers at the port of destination, which settlement is to be binding on the owner. The owner and master to have a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. Defendants failed to supply stiffening coal, whereby the ship was detained forty-eight days at the port of loading. Plaintiff sued for demurrage. Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on demurrage to statement of claim), that putting stiffening coal on board was "loading" within the demurrage clause, and therefore demurrage was payable, but that this was a liability under the charter-party, which ceased when the cargo was on board, and the only remedy was by the master's lien, and therefore plaintiff could not recover on the charter-party: (Sanguinetti v. The Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658. Ct. of App.)

In their accounts they charged him with the full insurance premiums, although they were allowed by the underwriters to retain out of the premiums 5 per cent. brokerage, and 10 per cent. discount for ready money, in accordance with the custom of the trade: Held, that as these allowances were usually made, and as the shipowner had for years assented to them, he could not now object to allow them to retain these allowances on taking the accounts in a suit with regard to a mortgage on certain ships of his. STOCKBROKER AND PRINCIPAL.—TRUST DEWY.—A trustee instructed his stockbroker to buy for him a sum of Consols, which he informed the broker he held as a trust fund, and to invest the proceeds of sale in the purchase of certain railway stock. The broker sold the Consols for cash, and received in payment a cheque which he paid to the credit of his current account with his bankers, and he bought the railway stock for the next settling day. On the settling day, the railway stock not having been paid for, the broker was declared a defaulter on the Stock Exchange, and soon afterwards he filed a liquidation petition. A principal claimed to have the balance which, at the time of the failure, was standing to the broker's credit at his banker's, appropriated to the good of the proceeds of sale of the Consols. Held, that as the broker had notice of the trust, the proceeds of sale retained the character of trust money in his hands, and could be followed by the principal if they could be traced. Per James, J.A., semble that this would have been so, even if the broker had had no notice of the trust: (Ex parte Cooke, re Strachan, 35 L. The reference to the lease was an error, the intention being to refer to property, held under a lease dated the 31st Dec. 1874, and made between the same persons as parties to the lease of the 25th Sept. 1874. AND H. HAMPSON (in Liquidation); Ex question in this case (argued by counsel, Pankhurst, on behalf of the mortgagees, a King society, and J. M. Yates on behalf of the debtor in liquidation) was as to whether certain fixtures, carding engines, planing machines, f pans, steamers, copper dye pans, lathes, and machines, &c., used in the hat manufacturing business by the debtors, and included in mortgage, could be claimed by the mortgagee, or had passed to the trustee as being in apparent possession of the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy.

HONOUR.—The only question reserved was whether the property which I have already held as the personal chattels was in the apparent possession of the debtors within the meaning of the Act of Sales Act, when they filed their petition on 5th Oct. last. The facts, so far as they bear on the point, were that on the 13th Oct. the mortgagees entered upon the premises comprised in the mortgage, and placed one Baggaley in possession. Baggaley received the keys of the premises, and either personally or by his servant, remained therein continuously until some time on the 16th of the same month, locking the premises at night and opening them in the morning to let in the workpeople. Meanwhile the debtors used the machinery and carried on their business as before, under a license given to them by the mortgagees, and for the purpose of working up the old stock. No fresh orders were obtained, but, according to the evidence of one of the debtors, had any been offered they would have been accepted. The object of the Bill of Sales Act as set forth in the preamble (inter alia) to protect trustees in bankruptcy (liquidation is now the same) from being defrauded by secret assignments and dispositions. It was therefore enacted that where an assignment of personal chattels had not been registered in the manner prescribed, and the assignor became bankrupt (here liquidated) the title of the trustee should prevail over the title of the assignee as to such portion of the chattels assigned as should be in the possession, or apparent possession, of the assignor at the time of his bankruptcy—that is, at the date of the act of bankruptcy: (Ex parte Terrell). Apparent possession was there defined to exist so long as the chattels are in any building or premises occupied by the assignor, or so long as they shall be used and enjoyed by him in any place whatever, although formal possession may have been obtained by another person. Now, applying this definition to the present facts, although it may be argued that from the time that Baggaley entered and received the keys of the building the debtors' occupation was at an end, it can hardly be disputed but that they were in full use and enjoyment of the chattels. There was no interference with their working the machinery on the part of Baggaley or his man, and nothing to show that they were not in possession in their own right. I can, therefore, come to no other conclusion but that their possession was apparent within the true construction of the Act. Ex parte Lewis, upon which Dr. Pankhurst relied, and which Mr. Yates, with great ingenuity, tried to distinguish, was, if anything, somewhat more favourable to the assignees; for, although the man in possession slept in an attic, he mixed with the debtor's family in the daytime and had his meals with them—a fact which might have led an inquiring creditor to ask how he came there, and who he was. There was also an attempt to advertise for sale. In Ex parte Homan, the bailiff had a copy of the bill of sale, with instructions to show it if anyone claimed to interfere. In both these cases the court ruled in favour of the trustee, giving in the latter as one reason that nothing had been done to change the possession in the eye of the outer world, so also in Ex parte Say the apparent possession was held to continue until the bailiffs began to pack up and remove the goods. In Ex parte Redfern the business was carried on under the sole management and control of the bailiff, irrespective altogether of the debtors, and the mill was actually closed before the petition was filed. This was held to support the assignees' claim. The principle to be deduced from this and other cases clearly is that when the debtors continue in the visible use and enjoyment of the chattels, and there is nothing which would indicate to the outer world that there was a change of possession, the mere fact of a bailiff being on the premises and holding the keys is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute. It was also contended on behalf of the trustee that the property was in the order and disposition of the debtors with the consent of the true owner, and it might, I think, be contended that although by placing Baggaley in possession the mortgagees withdrew his consent, yet by continuing to allow the debtor the exclusive use and enjoyment of the chattels a fresh contract may be presumed, but this I need not decide. The order of the court is that so much of the fund in court as arose from the sale of the personal chattels of the debtors be paid to the trustee in liquidation, the balance to the mortgagees, and that the costs of all parties be paid out of the estate.

Re ROSS; Ex parte ROSS.

Bankruptcy—Adjudication—Statute barred debt—Acknowledgment.

HIS HONOUR.—On the 10th Nov. 1876, the debtor filed a declaration in this court, admitting his inability to pay his debts, and on the 16th Nov. his sister, Frances Ross, filed the present petition in bankruptcy, alleging that the sum of £800 was due to her from the debtor for money lent in advance by her to him, and that he had committed an act of bankruptcy by filing the above declaration. The petitioner made the usual affidavit in support of her petition. The same solicitor acted for the debtor and petitioner in the above proceedings. The alleged debtor gave no notice of motion to dismiss the petition, but, on the contrary, filed an affidavit admitting the petitioner's debt of £800, and debts to other persons amounting to about £200. The petition came on for hearing on the 5th inst., and the petitioner's solicitor handed in the following documents, verified by the petitioner's affidavit in support of her petition. A letter dated the 14th Nov., 1876, from the debtor to the petitioner, containing the following passage: "I send you the acknowledgments you ask for, but do not send them on to Godfrey (the debtor's and petitioner's solicitor) unless he asks for them. If he does, however, of course send them. I do not think he will ask for them; but it is very likely he may send you an affidavit to sign. You see I acknowledge the debt, and therefore you will not have the same difficulty in proving the loan as if I disputed it. I expect every day to hear of the petition being lodged. 2nd, a stamped receipt as follows:

35, Albany-street, Edinburgh, 10th May, 1867.
Received from Miss Frances Ross the sum of three hundred pounds sterling, £300 sterling.

GEORGE CLARK ROSS.

3rdly, another stamped receipt, as follows:

35, Albany-street, Edinburgh, 14th Oct., 1868.
Received from Miss Frances Ross the sum of five hundred pounds sterling, £500 sterling.

GEORGE CLARK ROSS.

The receipts were inclosed in and apparently written at the same time as the above letter and on similar paper, and there is an alteration in the date of the second receipt. The petitioner alleged, and the debtor admitted, that the two sums of money mentioned in the receipts were advanced at the respective dates written on such receipts, and that the debtor's liability in respect of them is barred by the Statute of Limitations unless the acknowledgments in writing produced take the case out of the operation of the statute. Upon these facts I was clearly of opinion that the petitioner's debt, if existing, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, inasmuch as the acknowledgment in writing produced was evidently fraudulent and void, having been written by the debtor subsequently to the act of bankruptcy, viz., the filing his declaration of inability to pay, of which the petitioner had notice, and on which the petition is granted, and consequently that the petition must be dismissed. But the petitioner having obtained an adjournment, has now filed another affidavit, together with a letter from the debtor to the petitioner, dated the 3rd May 1874, in which, after expressing his satisfaction at the prospect of a visit from the petitioner, he adds, "One thing, however, I must tell you: I will not be able to pay you any of the £800 yet, so pray do not count upon it. I am very sorry for this, but must trespass still longer on your forbearance. I do wish I could begin to redeem that debt, but at present I cannot." And the petitioner contends that this letter was an acknowledgment of the two before-mentioned debts of £300 and £500, from which a promise to pay would be implied by a court of law, and which implied promise would bar the Statute of Limitations. Assuming the advances of £300 and £500 respectively to have been made at the above dates; it is to be observed that the former was barred at the date of the last-mentioned letter, but the latter was not. I do not, however, think that this makes any material difference in the present case. As to the question, however, whether this letter contains such an acknowledgment as is contended by the petitioner, I should have much doubt if the point were untouched by judicial decision. For an absolute promise to pay on demand seems to me to be a very strong implication from an acknowledgment or reference to a debt barred by the statute when it is accompanied by an express statement of the debtor's inability to pay the debt. At common law such an implication of law would have exposed him to immediate imprisonment, possibly for life, at the pleasure of his creditor, and since the Bankruptcy Acts it brings him immediately within their stringent provisions, as in the present case. I find, however, that in several cases such a statement of inability has not negatived the implied promise to pay a statute barred debt arising from its acknowledgment in writing, especially where, as in the present case, the creditor requests forbearance from his creditor: (See the cases of Wilby v. Elgee, 10 L. Rep. 497. C. P.; and Chasmore v. Turner, 10 L. Rep. 500 Q. B., and the earlier cases referred to in the last mentioned case.) I therefore think that the petitioner is entitled to an order of adjudication; but any other creditor will of course have the power of disputing her debt hereafter, if so advised.

Adjudication accordingly.

NOVEL PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE EDUCATION ACT.—The overseers for the township of Tapton, Derbyshire, having refused to honour a precept issued by the Brington School Board, application was made to the Chesterfield county magistrates to confirm a resolution of the board passed under the 56th section of the Act appointing an officer to make and collect the school rate independent of the overseers. The application was granted.

Mr. Morley said he was very glad to be upon to perform the pleasant and easy duty of expressing on behalf of the committee of Powlesland the sense which they entertained of the energy and determination that resulted in the bringing of two distinctly opposite parties to justice. He had been connected with his house of business for half a century, and he knew of nothing that had given him more satisfaction or was fraught with more danger, than the facility of selling by auction by men who offered the facilities for bringing them under circumstances of great suspicion, and ought to put them on their guard. These facilities being offered insolvent traders, and able to meet any sudden demand for the goods, the indisposition of wholesale dealers to do them credit, as they had only to go to the selling shops—for such auction rooms were for nothing else—and get what they wanted by depositing their creditors' goods. It was the interest of honest traders that a stop should be put to this practice, and he would like to watch it very closely, for it was clear that the law was strong enough to defeat such a course if it were only followed up with vigour. As a creditor, he expressed his admiration of the conduct of the trustees, Mr. Collins, in the early stage of the matter, and his determination as was half-way towards success. The facts of the case were, that Powlesland failed for £26,900, and handed his creditors, in the first instance, an amounting to more than £2950. For months prior to his failure he sold goods to the amount of £24,000 by auction, through, and within four months prior to his failure purchased goods to the amount of £20,000, sold legitimately £1400 worth, and by an immense sacrifice, £12,000 worth. By these facts that the bankrupt and his associates, convicted, and the judge made the most of there were no such men as Baylies there; very few Powleslands. He (Mr. Morley) said creditors were called upon to punish such a man whenever they could. It was no loss money, but he had always distinguished between the unfortunate trader and the fraudulent trader; he had fought hard for the unfortunate trader who had to give a good account of his proceedings, and commended them to let the honest man that he would find sympathy at the hands of creditors, while a man who could not give an account of himself should be dealt with severely. He congratulated all concerned on the results which had led to the meeting much pleasure in proposing the following: "That in the opinion of this committee Ashwell is entitled to and is tendered of the creditors for his promptitude, and tact in proceeding to Spain, tracing bankrupt, and ultimately obtaining his return to this country, and his acceptance is recorded on a cheque for £128 2s. in recognition of the same. That Mr. Edgar Austin is also entitled to the best thanks of the creditors for his untiring attention and ability in bringing to a successful issue, and his acceptance is requested of a cheque for £79 16s. in recognition thereof."

renewed (Messrs. Leaf, Sons, and Co.) the resolution, which was passed, and they presented the cheques.

Mr. Jackson (Messrs. G. Brettell and Co., Woodrope) proposed the thanks of the creditors to be recorded.

Mr. Morley (Messrs. Spreckley, White, and Sons) seconded the motion, and stated that in the case goods at half-a-crown a yard, and demand, were obtained from him, taken from his warehouse to the auctioneer's premises sold within four days at 10d. and 11d.

The resolution was passed, and a suggestion that resolutions should be engrossed and sent to Mr. Ashwell and Mr. Austin was words having been spoken in acknowledgment of Mr. Ashwell, Mr. Austin, and Mr. Collier. Mr. Crisp (of the firm of Ashurst, Morris, and Crisp) said that the greatest difficulty in the way of the creditors, who preferred to take the case and have no more trouble, was the delay confirmed this statement, and said that the need that existed for a public prosecutor bringing a fraudulent debtor to justice were acting in the general interest of the public and the expense and labour ought not to be put upon them.

of thanks to Mr. Morley for presiding in the proceedings.

THE LAW'S DELAY.

MORGAN writes to the Times: Sir,—Six years ago you did me the honour to publish an article in which I ventured to assert that, unless reinforced, at least one branch of our system must break down under the strain imposed upon it by recent legislation. I scarcely expected, however, that my article would be so soon verified, as the facts will, I hope, demonstrate.

In 1875, before the Judicature Acts came into force, the number of cases set down for the Court of Chancery, including appeals, was 317. In Jan. 1876, when the Acts came into operation two months, the number had perceptibly increased. At the time the motions awaiting decision by the Division of the High Court of Justice appeals from that division number 630.

words, the Judicature Acts have just the amount of work thrown upon the Bench as the cases set down have during the last year. The cases have during the last year kept steadily ahead of the cases disposed of. It is difficult to see how anything like an improvement is ever to be attained except by the most questionable process of exhausting the patience of suitors and driving men to prefer going to tardy justice.

that it has been the fashion to attribute the increase to transient or controllable causes. It has been suggested, for instance, that the substitution of ex parte affidavits for the hearing of a case has taken a longer time than it did formerly. If this fact, it must be accepted as an essential part of the problem to be solved, for no one can expect a return to the old mode of taking evidence in questions of disputed fact. Of late, the judges have very properly discontinued the practice of taking evidence ex parte where there was no real conflict of evidence, while the additional number of hours which they now sit may fairly be set off by the additional time occupied in hearing cases. Indeed, the fact that the orders of the Chancery Division during the year ending October, 1876, show an increase upon the year of 1875, or nearly five times the increase of the last ten years, proves conclusively that that division actually gets through more work than its predecessor. The explanation, therefore, of the phenomenon must be sought elsewhere.

What I take to be that the Judicature Acts have introduced a large amount of business which has not its way into our courts before. The effect of this new business has been and will continue to be towards the Chancery side of the Court, partly because the Acts have introduced certain classes of actions to the Division, and partly because of the administrative machinery which it has introduced, as well as the growing inclination of the suitors, when left unfettered, to prefer a trial before a judge to a trial before a jury. Still, a glance at the present condition of the so-called Common Law Courts will show that their business has also largely increased, though not, perhaps, at the same rate as ours. Indeed, the experience of the last fifteen months has demonstrated what, at first sight, would seem a paradox—that the result of improving the administration of justice is to increase rather than to diminish litigation. Nor ought this to surprise us. There are in this country thousands of persons who are ready to submit to almost any injustice rather than face the horrors of a law suit. If you ask them why they shrink from going to law, they will tell you that they dread its cost, its uncertainty, and its delay. Once made litigation less costly, less uncertain, and less protracted, and you rob it of more than half its terrors. That justice will ever become a really cheap luxury in England is, for reasons on which I need not dwell, scarcely probable; though, of course, in proportion as we make its forms more simple and less dilatory, we indirectly diminish its cost. But there is no reason whatever why its administration should not be both prompt and certain. Now, it is scarcely too much to say that our modern reforms have made our judicial system one of the least technical instead of being the most artificial in Europe; and the growing conviction on the part of the public that cases are at last being decided "on the merits" may be seen reflected in the state of our cause lists. But in a country in which time is money it is essential that justice should be swift as well as sure. How, then, is the object to be attained?

Now, I think it will be generally admitted that our Chancery Judges and their clerks work as hard as any men in England. Besides sitting in court five or six hours each day during the greater part of the year, the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors dispose of an immense amount of important work in Chambers and during the vacations. Nobody suggests that their time could be more economically distributed; indeed, Parliament has shown its appreciation of their method of conducting business by requiring the other judges to adopt it. Clearly, therefore, no more work can be got out of them. If we turn to Westminster Hall for help, we are told that the judges there have already more work on hand than they can get through. It follows, therefore, that, without an increase in the judicial strength of the Division, things must remain as they are.

It must not be forgotten that the number of Chancery Judges was fixed thirty-six years ago, at a time when railway enterprise was in its infancy, and joint stock companies almost unknown. Since then the population of England has increased by one-half, and its wealth has probably trebled. I wonder what would be said to a proposal to place the police magistrature of the country on the footing on which it stood in the year 1841. Yet in the interval litigation has increased at a far greater rate than crime.

As far as I am aware, the only real objection to such a step lies in the cost which it will entail upon the country; for the argument that if two or three new judges were appointed we should have to put up with inferior men on the bench may, by those who know the Bar of England, be dismissed with a smile. It has been said that the appointment of two new Vice-Chancellors, with their staffs, would involve a charge of £20,000 a year on the Exchequer. But this calculation leaves out of sight the important fact that Chancery actions are already to a great extent self-supporting, and, by the imposition of a very small additional tax on the litigant, might be made entirely so. Such a tax, if its proceeds were devoted to the purchase of fresh judicial power, would really be the best investment which the suitor could have for his money. Not long ago a witness in the court in which I practise, on being questioned as to the state of a particular water-course in Wales, replied that he could not speak as to its condition during the last three weeks, and when asked what he had been doing in the interval, explained that he had spent it in waiting for the case to come on. Does anyone who has realised the frightful cost of keeping twenty or thirty witnesses dangling about Lincoln's-inn for weeks, suppose that any suitor in his senses would not cheerfully consent to have his court fees trebled or quadrupled, in order to escape so terrible an infliction?

But are we really driven to this alternative? Is it really, as it is right that the doors of one of the highest courts in the kingdom should remain blocked for months simply because England cannot afford to expend upon it an infinitesimal part of the cost of a single ironclad? This is a question which the Government and the Legislature are, I apprehend, bound before long to answer. — I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

GEORGE OSBORNE MORGAN.
Lincoln's-inn, Jan. 10.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR of the County Palatine of Lancashire having retired from practice at the Bar, the London Courts will in future sit on Tuesday mornings, instead of at four o'clock, as formerly. The first London sitting will be on the 26th inst.

SPRING CIRCUITS.—In consequence of Easter falling so much earlier this year than last, it has been arranged to hold the spring circuits on or about the 15th Feb., to enable the judges, if possible, to finish the business before Good Friday, in which event they will secure a short vacation prior to the commencement of the succeeding sittings, which begin on the 16th April.

STRIKE OF BARRISTERS.—The Carlisle Patriot states that on Thursday, 4th Jan., there was some ferment at Carlisle quarter sessions when it became known that there was likely to be a breakdown of the machinery of justice owing to the gentlemen of the Bar having refused to take briefs in the cases for trial. This was in consequence of an intimation by the clerk of the peace (Mr. Nanson) that in future the Treasury would allow only a guinea a brief instead of two guineas as hitherto. The barristers declined to take the reduced fee, and there was nothing left to be done, save for the attorneys to place the briefs in the hands of the court, and let it deal with the matter as it thought best. Accordingly, when the deputy recorder (Mr. Leofric Temple, Q.C.) had concluded his charge to the grand jury, Mr. Wannop handed in a brief marked "one guinea," at the same time saying that there was a strike among the barristers, who would not accept the briefs at the fee allowed. Mr. Nanson said the matter had been brought before the deputy recorder, who had arranged to pay the two guineas on this occasion. Mr. Wannop.—Then I may mark the briefs two guineas? Mr. Nanson.—Yes. Shortly after this announcement the barristers came into court, and the threatened block was averted.

A SCENE IN COURT.—"I call upon you," said the counsellor, "to state distinctly upon what authority you are prepared to swear to the mare's age?"—"Upon what authority?" said the ostler, interrogatively.—"You are to reply, and not repeat the question put to you."—"I don't consider a man's bound to answer a question before he's time to turn it in his mind."—"Nothing can be more simple, sir, than the question put. I again repeat it. Upon what authority can you swear the animal's age?"—"The best authority," responded he, gruffly.—"Then why such evasion? Why not state it at once?"—"Well, then, if you must have it—"—"Must! I will have it," vociferated the counsellor, interrupting the witness.—"Well, then, if you must have it," rejoined the ostler, with imperturbable gravity, "why, then, I had it myself from the mare's own mouth." A simultaneous burst of laughter rang through the court. The judge on the bench could with difficulty confine his risible muscles to judicial decorum.

IMPORTANT DECISION ON LICENCE TRANSFERS.—The Recorder of Dublin gave judgment last week on the important question whether, in considering transfers of licences, he had jurisdiction to refuse those on the ground of the existence of an excessive number of public houses in the district. The point had been argued before him for three days. He considered there were no vested interests in the case that should fetter his discretion, and said that even if the number of houses were reduced by hundreds, the drinking facilities afforded by those that would remain had, of late years, increased a hundred-fold. The little paltry grocery, whose light scarce glimmered in the slums ten years ago was the Crystal Palace of to-night, sending its blazing radiance through the moral and material gloom of their most degraded neighbourhoods. If, as judicially held, he added, "I have to consider in all applications for licences the wants of the neighbourhood, I believe I am coerced by an overwhelming responsibility as ever pressed down fallen mortal to exercise it within moderate limits for the welfare of this great but, alas! degraded country." He was willing, however, to facilitate an appeal to the Queen's Bench to have his opinion reversed. The case excites much discussion among the owners of public-house property.

WORK IN THE CHANCERY DIVISION.—Tomorrow the High Court of Justice commences its sittings for the year, and, as regards the Chancery Division, with an arrear of work far larger than existed a year ago. It is a remarkable fact that, whereas the Judicature Acts were expected to operate in reducing the work of this division, the causes waiting to be heard exceed by upwards of 60 per cent, the number in the books at the beginning of 1876. This increase has been arrived at by gradual steps, ranging from 340 at the beginning of Hilary sittings, 457 at Easter, 502 at Trinity, and 569 at Michaelmas; and now the causes on the list number 556. Of course these cannot all be described as arrears; but seeing that four judges, working hard during the whole year, have been unable to make any real impression on the work, it is tolerably clear that very much of it must have been waiting some time. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that the appointment of another judge of the Chancery Division is in contemplation. This appointment, which has long been required, should allow of provision being made for all the Chancery judges to sit for one whole day in each week at Chambers. Their present custom of sitting in Chambers after a hard day in court is not conducive to really good work, besides being inconvenient, from the lateness of the hour, for all who have to attend them. The expense of appointing another judge is a matter with which Parliament will deal; but when it is absolutely necessary, the question of cost is a secondary consideration. The Treasury ideal of the administration of justice being self-supporting is not yet arrived at, nor will it ever be reached until all court fees are largely increased.—Globe, Jan. 11.

TITLE DEEDS.—"A Firm of Solicitors" write to the editor of the Times:—"Mr. Leefer deserves the thanks of the public for calling the attention of 'suits and their advocates' to the risk run from the destruction by fire of title deeds deposited in the tin and wooden boxes at the Record and Writ Clerks' Office, in a building which has not the 'slightest pretension to be considered fireproof.' The facts stated by Mr. Leefer are incontrovertible, and we are therefore not surprised to find that they remain uncontradicted. We venture to assert that there is scarcely a Government office in the kingdom in which the most important records are kept of matters relating to real or personal property, or incidents affecting the history, interests, or character of individuals, which is not more exposed to destruction by fire than are the ledgers of any respectable tradesman. Surely every Government office ought to be provided with fireproof receptacles for the protection of documents of value relating to public or private interests. Fireproof iron safes can be made of almost any dimensions and to suit any space, and the construction of strong rooms is a matter of no particular difficulty or expense. The public would no doubt be glad to hear what provisions are to be made in the new Law Courts against accidents by fire. Mr. Charley is in error in supposing that solicitors do not make use of fireproof safes, every solicitor's office bearing conspicuous proof to the contrary. We are, however, ready to admit that sufficient care is not taken in preserving documents of value against fire, such, for instance, as an original correspondence, which when destroyed cannot be replaced."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S HUMOUR.—Some of judges have been the most incorrigible of jokers, and have dealt out their wit very impartially to all comers. Lord Ellenborough was one of these. "What are you, sir?" asked his lordship on one occasion when a gentleman slipped into the witness-box, dressed in rather a fantastic style, and proceeded to give his evidence in a manner as eccentric as his dress. "I employ myself as a surgeon," was the rather unfortunate reply. "But does anyone else employ you as a surgeon?" gravely inquired the judge. On one occasion Lord Ellenborough was under the necessity of listening to an advocate who had the reputation of being a sound lawyer, but a terrible bore. The question before the Court was the rateability of certain lime quarries to the relief of the poor. Counsel contended, at a most wearisome length, that such property was not rateable, because the limestone in the quarries could be reached only by deep boring, which was a matter of science. "Well," interrupted his lordship, "as to that, you will hardly succeed in convincing us, sir, that every species of boring is a matter of science." It is said that there was only one man in court who failed to see the joke. The famous judge has been credited with innumerable witticisms, some of them exceedingly sarcastic and telling. Henry Hunt, a noted demagogue of his day, was once before him to receive sentence upon a conviction for holding a seditious meeting, and he began a speech in mitigation of penalty by complaining of certain persons who accused him of "stirring up the people by dangerous eloquence." "My impartiality as a judge," mildly observed the Lord Chief Justice, "calls upon me to say, sir, that in accusing you of that they do you great injustice." While speaking of this great judge, there is an anecdote about him which has often been told before, but which ought to be repeated here, although for a moment it takes us fairly out of court, and cannot be given as an instance of wit. It is related that when on one occasion he was about to set out on circuit, his wife proposed to accompany him, a proposition to which his lordship assented, provided there were no bandboxes tucked under the seat of his carriage, as he had too often found there had been when he had been thus honoured before. Accordingly Lord and Lady Ellenborough set out together, but had not proceeded very far before the judge, stretching out his hand under the seat in front of him, kicked at the slimy receptacles which he had specially prohibited. Down went the window and out went the bandbox into the ditch; and when the coachman pulled up, supposing that the box had been accidentally dropped out, he was rather savagely ordered to drive on, and let the thing lie where it was. They reached the assize town in due course, and his lordship proceeded to robe for the court. "And now where is my wig?"—where's my wig?" he demanded, when everything else had been donned. "Your wig, my lord," replied his servant, "was in the bandbox your lordship threw out of the window as we came along."—Leisure Hour.

A DISCLAIMER.—In a leading article in the LAW TIMES of 6th Jan. you give an account of a singular incident, which you state "occurred at the recent quarter sessions held at Exeter." AGENTS PRACTISING AS ADVOCATES IN COUNTY COURTS.—I have read the letter of "A Liverpool Solicitor" in your last issue, and in your editorial you desire further information on the subject. As the accountant referred to in the letter, I ask insertion of this by way of correcting "A Liverpool Solicitor," if he is ignorant of the facts. The case alluded to was a claim against the London and North-Western Railway Company, for whom Mr. B. Montague Preston, of Chester, is the solicitor, and it was expected that he would have been present at the trial, but for some reason, which I know not, he did not attend, and the judge allowed Mr. Charles Ferrand, managing clerk to Mr. Preston, to go on with the case. For the plaintiff I had instructed Mr. William Lowe, solicitor, and he had well gone into the case, when through some urgent business he was compelled to leave the court. Now what was to be done? Must the case be adjourned at the inconvenience of all parties present, to satisfy "A Liverpool Solicitor," or any number of solicitors, or, as was done by permission of the judge, allow me, who had instructed the solicitor, to proceed? I flatter myself that I am as well qualified as any solicitor for such a position. I am a certificated accountant, and the railway company's detective is a gentleman whose knowledge of railway law does him credit. Therefore, so far the letter does not represent fairly what took place, and "A Liverpool Solicitor" would do well in future, if, before writing such misleading letters, to inquire a little into what he complains of. As the other part of the letter does not personally refer to me, I will only add that the Registrars of the Liverpool County Court are as jealous of professional etiquette as any judge or registrar can be, and it is unfair to those gentlemen that such a statement should have been made. I have only one conclusion to draw from "A Liverpool Solicitor's" letter, and I do so in all charity, viz., that he is some unknown solicitor who has not risen in the Profession, and envies the agents who frequent the court of the commission they so deservedly earn, and which the Liverpool solicitor thinks he ought to have. Surely the Profession is not lowering, as I believe there is not a solicitor in Liverpool of any standing who would notice that which your correspondent seems so bitter about.

THE late Charles Neaves, Lord Neaves, one of the judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, who died on the 23rd of Dec., at his residence in Char- lotte-street, Edinburgh, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, was the son of the late Charles Neaves, Esq., one of the procurators of the Court of Admiralty in Scotland, and was born in Edinburgh in the year 1800. He was educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh, and was admitted an advocate at the Scottish Bar in 1822. He was appointed Advocate Depute in 1841, Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland in 1845, Solicitor-General for Scotland in 1852, and a Lord of Session in 1854, in which last capacity he bore the courtesy title of Lord Neaves. In 1858 he was appointed, in addition, a Lord of Justiciary. The deceased was distinguished not only as a learned lawyer, but also as one of the most prominent literary workers in Scotland. Although his contributions to literature were mostly anonymous, their author- ship it is stated, was generally pretty well known. His "Poems by an Old Contributor to Maga" (Blackwood) went through many editions, and his quaint, half classical, half scientific songs, sung at the convivial meetings of the Royal Society's Club, must be familiar to many a jovial savant. In society he was extremely popular. In 1858 he appeared as the opposition candidate against Mr. Gladstone for the Lord Rectorship of Edinburgh University, but was unsuccessful. A few years later, however, he was elected to the same office by the students of St. Andrews. Lord Neaves married, in 1835, a daughter of the late Colonel Macdonald, Esq., of Dalness, N.B.

Sir John Cam Hobhouse, some time M.P. for Westminster and President of the Board of Control, who was created Lord Broughton de Giffard, but whose peerage became extinct at his decease a few years ago. Mr. Hobhouse was born in the year 1807, and was educated at the Charterhouse and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1828. He was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple in Trinity Term 1833, and for a short time went the western circuit. At the general election of Dec. 1832 and Dec. 1834 he appeared as a candidate for the representation of Aylesbury, but was unsuccessful on each occasion; he, however, obtained a seat for Rochester in the first Parliament of Her Majesty. In 1841 he offered himself as a candidate for Newark, but was defeated by Mr. Gladstone and Lord John Manners. He represented Lincoln from 1848 to 1852, when he retired from public life.

by which means ridicule is cast upon the administration of justice. As it has been very justly remarked, such a state of things would not be tolerated in any other institution.

OUR article in last week's impression on the application of the Bills of Sale Act to fixtures, was penned prior to the decision of Sir J. BACON, C.J., on the 18th ult., in Re Eslick, ex parte Alexander (reported in our journal of the 30th ult., at p. 158), where, on appeal, the judgment of Mr. FALCONER, at Aberdare, to which in that article, and also in the LAW TIMES of the 11th Nov., we directed the attention of our readers, was reversed. The judgment of Sir J. BACON will be found fully to justify our opinion that the cases of Hawtrev v. Bullin, Begbie v. Fenwick, and Ex parte Dalglisch, are sound law, and unaffected by the decision of the House of Lords in Meux v. Jacobs.

AN important point of practice has arisen out of the collision between the Franconia and Strathclyde. In the Common Pleas Division an action under Lord Campbell's Act was commenced against the owners of the Franconia by the representative of a person who was drowned on that occasion; and the court had to decide whether it would allow service of a writ of summons upon the defendants, who reside in Germany. It appears that the full sum of £8 per ton has been paid by the owners of the Franconia in respect of the loss of the Strathclyde; and that, bail having been taken to the extent of a further sum of £7 per ton to answer damages for personal injuries which may be given in any future action against the ship in which her liability in an action in rem to pay damages under Lord Campbell's Act may be established, she has been released. The court held that it has no jurisdiction under Order XI., r. 1, to direct service of a writ of summons abroad in a personal action where the act for which damages are sought arises out of the jurisdiction. This is a consequence of the judgment in the case of Reg. v. Keyn, which decided that the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts stops at low water mark. There is a certain statutory jurisdiction up to a distance of three miles from the coast, but it is in the Court of Admiralty, and in actions in rem. Damages, therefore, for loss of life must be sought in Germany, unless it should be decided that they may be given in the Admiralty Court in an action in rem.

THE recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Murdock v. Warner, will, it is anticipated, have a serious influence in distributing probate actions amongst the several Common Law Divisions of the High Court of Justice. The result of that decision in brief is that all jury causes in the Common Law Divisions, except Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, will in future be tried in their order by the sitting Judge, without regard to the division to which he belongs. Two consequences may be expected to follow from this. In the first place actions which have for some time past been confined to the Probate Court will be tried in other divisions of the High Court of Justice. Secondly, there will of necessity be a greater accumulation of work in the latter divisions. Whether the new practice will be altogether advantageous it is hard to say. Certainly there is every probability that it will be found to work well in the main, in spite of the fact that it must, like all changes, disturb the existing state of things. If any great inconvenience will be felt it will, we anticipate, be wholly felt in probate actions. At the same time we cannot say that we think much of the argument that the Bench and Bar, in a court devoted to certain special branches of law, are at all better qualified to decide upon that law, at least in its more difficult aspects, than lawyers of a wider range.

THE meaning of the term "right of appeal" in the 6th section of the County Court Act 1875, upon which we believe much controversy to have arisen, has now been laid down in the case of Turner v. Great Western Railway Company, decided on Wednesday last. Under the 13th section of the County Court Act of 1867, "an appeal shall be allowed in actions in which an appeal is not now allowed, if the Judge should think it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed." By the 6th section of the County Court Act of 1875, in County Court actions in which any persons aggrieved has a right of appeal, "it shall be lawful for any person aggrieved by the ruling of the County Court Judge to appeal by motion to the court to which such appeal lies, instead of by special case." It was contended in Turner v. Great Western Railway Company that no "right" of appeal could be said to exist in a case where the appeal itself was purely in the discretion of the Judge. But the court (Justices MELLOR and LUSH) refused to give so narrow a construction to the Act of 1875, and held that where a Judge gives leave to appeal under the Act of 1867, the party has as much "right of appeal" under the 6th section of the Act of 1875 as if he had the right given to him immediately by statute. It is worth while to observe that the old appeal by special case, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, ss. 14, 15, is still a subsisting procedure with that marked out by the Act of 1875. The sections of the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, which give the right of appeal by case (sects. 14, 15) are neither expressly nor impliedly repealed by it.

The Law and the Lawyers.

Judges of a great country like England should be complain that the legal business is obstructed because insufficient court accommodation is a remarkable incident in our history. The Judges ought to be great influence, and capable of putting pressure upon ment through the LORD CHANCELLOR, so as to prevent recurrence of judicial complaints. They, however, refer to ventilate grievances of this nature in court, III.—No. 1764.

(See County Court Rules, Order XXI.) Those sections, however, apply only to causes of the amount to which jurisdiction is given by the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, that is, to causes of an amount between £20 and £50. The learned Judges were inclined to hold at one period of the argument that the "appeal by case" was repealed by implication; and it is no doubt a matter of some difficulty to elucidate the legal result of the half dozen Acts which govern the subject. The County Court Acts seem to stand in some need of consolidation.

Not long ago we gave our readers a short sketch of the history of the Divisional Court of Appeal. That court has now undergone another transformation, or rather has altogether ceased to exist as a separate court. The 45th section of the Judicature Act 1873, ordered that appeals from inferior courts should be transferred to Divisional Courts of the High Court of Justice. Last year a Judge was assigned by each Division of the High Court to determine such appeals. Thus the Divisional Court was formed. A rule, made in Dec. 1875, under which the Judges sit, was annulled in Dec. 1876. The Divisional Court of Appeal has therefore held its last sittings as a separate court. As things now stand the appeals may be heard by a Divisional Court of either the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer. We do not know that any importance attaches to these changes, further than that they show the difficulty of putting an end to the period of transition and changes.

If animals impounded are not supplied with food and water according to the provisions of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92 (the Cruelty to Animals Act 1849), it is not the keeper of the pound who is liable to the penalty of 20s. imposed by that section, but the party who delivered the animals to the keeper of the pound. So it was decided, on Wednesday last, by two judges of the Queen's Bench Division, in Dargan v. Davies, a case stated by two justices of the peace for the county of Pembroke, and we see no reason whatever to question the correctness of the decision. The particular justices who stated the case had dismissed the information against the pound keeper, but we understand that many justices in different parts of the country have taken a contrary view of the statute. It appears that three Acts have been passed bearing upon the question. First, under the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 59, s. 4, a penalty of 5s. was imposed upon the person impounding the animal and failing to provide him with food and water, and the cost of succouring the animal was allowed to be recovered from the party impounding. Secondly came the Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, by the 4th section of which it is enacted that "every person who shall impound or confine, or cause to be impounded or confined," any animal in any pound, "shall provide a sufficient quantity of fit and wholesome food and water to such animal;" while, by the 6th section, any person may enter a pound in which an animal has been confined for twelve successive hours without food or water, for the purpose of succouring the animal, and may recover the cost from the owner. Thirdly, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, the party impounding may recover the cost of food and water from the owner of the animal, and may also sell the animal within seven days in open market. This last Act was passed because it was doubtful whether the Act of 1849 "gives any remedy to the person impounding for the recovery of a compensation for the food and water supplied, although in the Act of 1849 full provisions for those purposes were contained."

The Judicature Act 1873, provides that the Court of Appeal when hearing any appeals in Ecclesiastical causes which may be referred to it shall be constituted of such Judges, and assisted by such Assessors, being Archbishops or Bishops of the Church of England, as Her MAJESTY by any general rules may think fit to direct. The new rules made in accordance with this section will come into operation on Tuesday next. The Assessors appointed will take their seats at the Judicial Committee. It is evident from the above section that a distinction is drawn between the office of Judge and that of Assessor. The Assessors who, unlike the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, the ARCHBISHOP of YORK, and the BISHOP of LONDON do not occupy the position ex officio, will sit apart. The attendance of the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, the BISHOPS of CHICHESTER, ST. DAVID'S, ELY, and ST. ASAPH, is provided for on the rota of the present year. The fourth rule relates to the number of Assessors and to the necessity of their presence on the Board in order that proceedings may be valid. "A summons to attend on the hearing of every ecclesiastical case about to be heard before the said Judicial Committee shall be issued to the five ecclesiastical Assessors for the time being, and no such case shall be heard before the said Judicial Committee unless there are at least three of such Assessors present at the hearing; provided that the Assessors present at the commencement of the hearing of any such case shall continue to be the assessors for that case until it shall be fully heard and disposed of, although their term of office, according to the rotation aforesaid, may in the meantime have expired; provided, also, that in the event of resignation, or absence, by reason of illness or any other reasonable cause, of any one of the Assessors present at the commencement of the hearing, the hearing case may proceed so long as at least two Assessors are present. With respect to the rotation mentioned, it should be as the rules provide for the attendance of the ecclesiastical Assessors by rotation for the next three years. After that period of rotation will continue to be annual.

THE question raised in the Queen's Bench Division on this inst., in the case of Rabbitt v. Cox is interesting, though the but few people probably who will be affected by the decision Fishmongers' Company having bought some freehold land, beginning of the 17th century built a hospital upon the site, the company subsequently determined to lay out more money in the erection of dwellings for twelve persons, and bought a new piece of ground. In the following year they received a Royal Charter to found a hospital or almshouse. The warden and six brethren were accordingly incorporated as a hospital, and commenced erecting thirteen almshouses for poor persons. More almshouses were built last century. In 1848 the company bought the fee-simple of some other land, the land-tax of which was redeemed. In the following year the Court of Chancery made an order that the company might take down the almshouses already erected, and re-erect them on the land last purchased. This was done, and the former site was leased to the plaintiffs by the company for a term of seventy years from 1858. This land had formed the site of the old hospital, in respect of which the company had never been assessed to pay the land-tax. The plaintiffs assessed in 1860, but never paid the tax. In 1871 the defendants were made the agent of the Land Tax Commissioners, levied on the plaintiffs' goods for the arrears payable under the assessment. His present action. Here the liability of the defendant depends on a very simple question. The sites of hospitals are exempt from land tax; did the land thus leased come within the exemption? It seems a very natural answer to this question to say that the exemption from liability to pay should continue only so long as the site continued to be occupied by a hospital. This was the opinion of the court in interpreting the provisions of 4 W. & M. c. 1, and 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, applicable to the question.

DESIRABLE as it undoubtedly is to put an end to any system tends to protract trials which are practically undefensible case of Frederici v. Van der Zee, which came before the Court of Appeal on the 17th inst., shows that the conditions in upon the plaintiff by Order XIV., rule 1, are imperative that no application to apply to sign final judgment for was defence will be entertained if those conditions are not fulfilled 1st rule of Order XIV. provides that where the defendant on a writ of summons specially indorsed under Order III, the plaintiff may on affidavit verifying the cause of action swearing that in his belief there is no defence to the call on the defendant to show cause before the court or a Judge the plaintiff should not be at liberty to sign final judgment the amount so indorsed. In the above case the plaintiff a foreigner abroad. Hence an application was made to Justice LUSH, at chambers, to admit the affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor in proceeding under the rule quoted. His Lordship acceded to the application, but his decision was set aside by a divisional court, whose decision has been affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN thought it was impossible to escape from the terms of the rule which requires an affidavit of the plaintiff's own belief. Suppose, then, urged, the plaintiff is in New Zealand? "Then," replied Lordship, "the suitor cannot make the affidavit required was then urged that an agent might make such an affidavit on behalf of the plaintiff. His Lordship expressed his opinion to effect that, even conceding this—though he would be disposed to admit that anyone but the party himself can make an affidavit on his own belief—the affidavit offered in the present case was not an affidavit of a cause of action. This view was adopted by other Judges. This case can scarcely be said to be an authority upon the question raised on behalf of the plaintiff, inasmuch as the affidavit, even if made by the plaintiff, would have been insufficient.

WITHIN the last month two important decisions have arrived at by the Courts upon the subject of pleading. The effect is at first sight contradictory, and they appear to be that the rights of a plaintiff and of a defendant are extensive. In the case of Hall v. Eve, the Court of Appeal sitting at Lincoln's Inn, was asked to confirm an order made out a replication, on the ground that it was irregular and erroneous in point of form, whereas the proper course would have been to amend the claim. The court refused to do so, and the pleadings were in effect as follows: The plaintiff asked for a declaration of performance; the defendant opposed it because the contract alleged by the plaintiff had amounted to a forfeiture; and the proposed defence was that the plaintiff had set up a leave and licence. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was based upon technical grounds. The rules, then, decided, did not prevent the plaintiff from drawing his lines in his own way. He had the right under their provisions to state facts in his reply; and was not under any obligation to anticipate by his statement of claim a matter which was the act of defence, and the ground of refusal to order the reply to be struck out was the want of such a reason as would justify the interference of the court necessary in the interests of justice.

In effect, the plaintiff in this case merely omitted to state in his claim a fact to his own advantage, which was exactly counteracted by another fact to his disadvantage, also unnoticed by the court.

So far as his pleadings were concerned the omission was merely of two facts, which might be called positive and negative. When the one was raised against him by the defendant, it was only reasonable not to object to allow him to set up the other. There is more difficulty in explaining the case of Norris v. Beazley, which was heard at the end of last week by the Divisional Court in Common Pleas. There the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant as acceptor of a bill of exchange: the defence was that the plaintiff was only a trustee for a company; and in that character he had made a counter-claim charging a fraudulent misrepresentation, in effect a failure of consideration for the bill, and claiming damages for the fraud. The plaintiff replied that the defendant's agent knew all the facts and joined issue; the defendant asked leave to rejoin that the agent on whom he relied for information conspired with the plaintiff to deceive him. Leave was given by the Master, but this rejoinder was rescinded on appeal. The rules give no right of rejoiner without first obtaining the leave of the court. It was held that the question of fraud might have been raised in evidence upon the pleadings as they stood, in spite of Order XIX., r. 18, which requires fraud to be specially alleged. A special allegation was necessary in the statement of defence because it had to be amended. The court saw no reason for its interference in the interests of justice. It was argued for the defendant, in analogy to the case of Hall v. Eve, that the counter-claim was merely a statement of claim in a cross action by the defendant; that unless leave to rejoin were given, a plaintiff and defendant would have unequal rights; that the question of rejoiner was raised by the plaintiff in his reply, which step stood in conformity with the counter claim in the place of a statement of defence; and that, according to the tenour, if not in the words of Order XIX., r. 18, it was necessary to repudiate the agency. The court, however, as before mentioned, held that it had the power to exercise its discretion; and, in the case before it, would exercise that discretion by leaving matters where the rules of procedure left them. Pleadings are required, so said their Lordships, to be as short as possible, and they must not state matters in dispute as evidence. They seemed to see in a rejoinder a breach of these principles. It is to be hoped that the decision in the case of Norris v. Beazley will be reviewed by a higher tribunal. It is important that the rights of plaintiff and defendant should be equal; and that, as in Hall v. Eve, the plaintiff should be justified in not pleading a forfeiture which had been pleaded, so the defendant in Norris v. Beazley may be permitted to plead an agency which determined itself by the fraudulent conduct of the agent.

The reform has attracted so much public attention of late that a suggestion made with the object of amending the law, whether by changes to substantive law or to procedure and practice, will be sure to receive a fair amount of consideration. At the recent meeting of the Law Amendment Society Mr. Serjeant Cox read a paper "On Reform in the Procedure of Magistrates' Courts." The reform indicated by the learned Serjeant as desirable was such as would render the procedure in those courts as simple and intelligible as possible. Briefly stated, the arguments advanced and suggestions made may be summarised in the following terms: although the County Court procedure had been simplified with advantage, the customs were allowed to prevail in magistrates' courts, in spite of the fact that a far greater proportion of the suitors in the County courts appeared in person without professional assistance. Then, should the change be initiated? Let the Magistrates' Courts be assimilated as far as possible to the County Court. Thus the County Court may be a short plain upon which, as a general rule, the Magistrate's clerk should be required to issue the summons under the seal of the court on payment of a nominal fee for the summons, and a mileage charge for service, unless the complainant undertook to serve it personally. The plaintiff should state the charge shortly, but with sufficient exactness to enable the defendant to know its nature. This change, it is said, and we think truly, would at once sweep away hundreds of printed forms which magistrates' clerks now find it necessary to keep. Brevity, and simplicity, should be the aim in all documents used by the court, as to the hearing: The court should have power to consolidate complaints at its discretion; and the Evidence Act should apply to non-indictable offences. Brevity should be the aim in actions likewise. Then there follows the important suggestion that all magistrates should have a general power to adjourn proceedings, as well as to direct an indictment for any offence. With respect to the designation of those courts, it is suggested that they should have some definite title, such as the Justices' Court at Blank, or the like. As to officials, each court should have its own, the clerk being paid by salary, not by fees. The fees, costs, and fines should form a common fund, out of which all the expenses of the court should be paid, the yearly balance, if any, being paid over to the Treasury. Then followed some remarks upon the improvement of the system of penalties. The HOME SECRETARY has already objected to a too frequent resort to imprisonment; but, as the learned Serjeant pointed out, he had suggested no plan by which the same ends might be obtained by other means. The improvements suggested by Serjeant Cox are that the magistrates should be enabled to order payment by instalments; that sureties might be allowed to be taken for payment of penalties, and, in some cases, for good behaviour, in lieu of imprisonment, upon the understanding that in case of forfeiture the term of imprisonment should be doubled. With respect to the admission of prisoners to bail the learned Serjeant's experience enabled him to say that the practice might be considerably extended with safety. During the twelve years he had presided at the Middlesex Sessions, upwards of 20,000 prisoners had been tried, and of these at least one-tenth had been admitted on bail. During the whole of that term he could not recall half a dozen instances of escape by the accused. Strange to say, in all those cases the accused were of the better class. The paper, it will be seen, covers a wide range of questions, which cannot be at all discussed within the limits of a notice like the present. We may, however, safely say that the paper, broadly speaking, shadows forth what is beyond dispute the characteristic tendency of legal reform, namely, the tendency to simplicity and uniformity.

THE application made in the Exchequer Division, on the 16th inst., in the case of the Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway v. Lefevre and Tucker, is rather a good illustration of the working of Order XVI., rule 3, of the Rules of Court 1875. That rule, it will be recollected, provides generally that all persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. And judgment may be given against such one or more of the defendants as may be found liable, according to their respective liabilities, without any amendment. In the case alluded to an action was brought by the plaintiff company against the defendant Lefevre for specific performance of an agreement, and to recover damages for a breach of an agreement to take £80,000 of debentures for the company. The other defendant is a solicitor. The claims against him arose out of the same transaction, the action being for misrepresentation of authority. Clearly both claims could not be sustained, for if one defendant was the agent of the other, and contracted so as not to incur any personal liability, no action would lie against him; on the other hand, if the one defendant had not authorised the latter to enter into a contract on his behalf, he would not be liable as principal. Upon a previous ex parte application by the plaintiff, Barons BRAMWELL and AMPHLETT allowed the defendant TUCKER to be joined. The latter appealed from that decision. It was urged on behalf of the respondent that although the causes of action were not technically the same, yet the case was such as was contemplated by the Judicature Act. Besides in a case not yet reported (Bingham v. Alexander) the course adopted supported the respondent's application. There a broker whose authority had been disputed by his principal, was added by Mr. Justice BLACKBURN as defendant at the Liverpool Assizes. Apparently there had been a shuffling of responsibility. The jury found that the broker was authorised, and a verdict and judgment were entered against the one defendant and for the other. The rule in question was framed to put an end to the anomaly of one jury finding one verdict and another finding another in the same case, an anomaly which, as the LORD CHIEF BARON remarked, had existed from time immemorial. The appellant's contention was simply that, as the decision of Barons BRAMWELL and AMPHLETT was made upon an ex parte motion, he was not bound. The disadvantage of the permission to join being granted, would be that one defendant might be put into the box to prove the case against the other. This may, perhaps, be a disadvantage to the defendants, but on public grounds no disadvantage exists. The court refused the application to strike out the name of the solicitor. It seems to us that this is really the only decision to which the court could have arrived. The language of the rule is too clear to admit of serious doubt. All persons may be joined as defendants, against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. According to the strict letter of this rule, a mere allegation of even a right to relief in the alternative is sufficient to entitle a plaintiff to join a third person as defendant. It is impossible to see how the exercise of this power can work harm if the wide control possessed by the court over the question of costs is borne in mind. Of the utility of the rule nothing need be said. The existence of such an anomaly as that referred to by the LORD CHIEF BARON is itself good cause for the introduction of some provision calculated to maintain the credit of the jury system.

AGENCY—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO THIRD PARTIES WHERE AN AGENT CONTRACTS IN HIS OWN NAME (a)

WHERE an agent enters into a contract in his own name, he is prima facie liable upon that contract, and the question arises whether parol evidence is admissible to relieve the agent of this prima facie liability. In entering into such a contract the following cases are possible, and, as will be seen, the liability of the agent will depend upon the class to which the circumstances of his case may be referred.

1. The agent may act in his own name, and on his own behalf, intending to do so.
2. He may contract in his own name, intending to act as agent, the fact of his agency being unknown to the other contracting party, or the fact of his agency may be known to the other party (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 481).
3. He may distinctly contract on behalf of another without disclosing his principal's name.
4. The fact of his agency may not only be known to the other party, but the latter may agree verbally not to treat the agent as the principal in the transaction.
5. Although the instrument signed is apparently a contract binding upon the agent, he may be able to show that it does not contain any real agreement: (Pym v. Campbell, 6 E. & B. 370; Roger v. Hadley, 2 H. & C. 227.)
6. The contract may be due to mistake or duress, or it may be illegal.

The first and last class of cases belong to the general law of contracts. As to the second class, it may be laid down generally that, wherever an agreement is made, parol evidence may be given to show that one or both of the contracting parties were agents for other persons, and acted as such agents in making the contract so as to give the benefit of the contract on the one hand to, and charge with liability on the other, the unnamed principals; and this whether the agreement be or be not required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds. This evidence in no way contradicts the written agreement. It does not deny that it is binding on those whom, on the face of it, it purports to bind, but shows that it also binds another, by reason that the act of the agent, in signing the agreement in pursuance of his authority, is in law the act of the principal: (Per cur. in Higgins v. Senior (8 M. & H. 844). In other words, where an agent contracts in his own name, parol evidence is admissible to charge the principal, but not to discharge the agent, except in the cases to be noticed hereafter. First, then, with respect to those cases in which the agent has contracted in his own name, but sets out the fact of his agency:

Norton v. Herron (1 C. & P. 648), 1825, was an action for breach of the following agreement:—

"Memorandum of an agreement . . . between George Herron (the defendant) on behalf of Edward Barron of the one part, and J. Norton of the other . . . the said G. H. doth hereby agree to execute a lease . . . to hold from."

The tenant in possession refused to quit, and the plaintiff could not obtain the lease.

"It is said," remarked Chief Justice Best, "that as the defendant entered into the contract on behalf of Barron, therefore the action should be brought against Barron. The case of the deed (Appleton v. Binks, 5 East, 148) is stronger than this; but the last case cited (Burrell v. Jones, 3 B. & A. 47) was that of a simple contract. In that case it was held that the word solicitor was mere description, and I cannot distinguish between that case and the present; and I am of opinion that the agreement is binding on the defendant. The cases of brokers are different, because there the fact of agency is known to every one; but in this case the man, after describing himself as agent, goes on to contract in his own name."

The case of Wilson v. Hart (7 Taunt. 295), 1817, has caused some confusion by being referred to as one of the earliest cases illustrating the liability of agents. The decision in that case is one upon the liability of undisclosed principals only. The marginal note is quite misleading.

In Jones v. Littledale (6 Ad. & El. 486), decided in 1837, the question was definitely raised. This was an action for non-delivery of hemp. The defendant's brokers at Liverpool sold hemp by auction at their rooms, and gave the following invoice:

"— Jones.
Bought of J. and H. Littledale.
Sixty-four bales of hemp. . . .
Settled, Nov. 26."

(Signed by defendant's clerk).

It was argued that parol evidence was admissible not only to charge a party not mentioned in the contract, but also to exonerate the seller named on proof of his agency. Such evidence was held not to be admissible to free the defendants from liability.

In a considered judgment of the court, it was observed by Lord Denman: "There is no doubt that evidence is admissible, on behalf of one of the contracting parties, to show that the other was an agent only, though contracting in his own name, and to fix the real plaintiff; but it is clear that if the agent contracts in such a form as to make himself personally liable, he cannot afterwards, whether his principal was or was not known at the time of the contract, relieve himself of that responsibility. It was observed by the court in Higgins v. Senior (8 M. & N. 845) that the decision in this case was supported on the ground that the agent really intended to act as principal. Jones v. Littledale was commented upon in Elliott v. Elliott (5 H. & N. 117), in which case, however, the point was whether an invoice was in itself a contract or merely evidence of a contract. In the latter case the jury found that the invoice was not contained in the invoice; and the court held that a mere invoice is not itself a contract, so as to exclude evidence to the effect that the name stated as vendor is not a contracting party. "It is said," remarked Baron Alderson, "that it is difficult to distinguish this case from Jones v. Littledale; it may be so, but it seems to me a mistake pervades that judgment. It supposes that if there be a parol contract which does not comply with the Statute of Frauds, an invoice afterwards sent becomes a contract. Baron Channell distinguished the latter case, on the ground that the sale there was by broker, and by auction; there was evidence of custom at Liverpool to contract as principal in order to insure the money passing through their hands; also thought that the decision in that case might be supported on the ground (suggested by Mr. Justice Coleridge), that as the defendants, by their dealing, undertook to deliver."

In Mages v. Atkinson (2 M. & W. 440) 1837, evidence was given to exonerate an agent from personal liability was rejected. The defendants were sharebrokers, one of whom, T., sold shares to the plaintiff, through his broker, S., fifty South-Western Railway shares. An entry of this sale was made on the defendant's books as of a sale from them to S. A contract note to the same effect was sent to S. T. afterwards sold other shares to B., and a contract note to be sent to him as well as to S. Finding that there had already been sent to S., and in the defendant's name he inserted the entry in the book, inserting the name of J., his principal, fifty shares, as sellers, and directed another note to be sent to J. with J.'s name as seller. S. received the two notes; neither note was returned, nor did the defendants wish the first returned. Mr. Justice Patteson left it to the jury to say whether the second note was a correction of a mistake, or first, and told them that if the defendants signed the contract in their own names they were liable, although known to be acting as agents, but rejected evidence to show that it was the custom in Liverpool to send in broker's notes without disclosing the principal. Verdict was given for the plaintiff. A rule for a new trial was refused on the grounds of misdirection and rejection of evidence, was refused.

"The custom offered to be proved," said Baron Alderson, "is a custom to violate the common law of England." The court held that it was properly left to the jury to say whether the second note was a disclosure of the plaintiff's name at the time of the contract, or whether it was adopted as a variation of the contract.

Higgins v. Senior (8 M. & W. S. 34) 1841, was an action for non-delivery of iron. The defendants, iron merchants and commission agents, gave to the plaintiffs' agent a sold note in the following terms:—

"We have this day sold through you to Messrs. V. Higgins and J. Senior, JOHN SENIOR, WM. SENIOR."

Baron Rolfe, before whom the trial was heard, told the jury that if the above note was the contract the defendant was liable, whether he intended to act for himself or the company; the defendants were notoriously agents; but if they chose to contract in their own name they were responsible. The judge refused to admit evidence to prove that the contract entered into on behalf of a third party. The jury found for the plaintiffs.

A rule obtained for a nonsuit or a new trial was discharged on the ground that Mages v. Atkinson (2 M. & W. 440) was authority, and undistinguishable from this case.

SERVICE OF WRITS OUT OF THE JURISDICTION

THE fusion of law and equity, and the provision of section 2 of the Judicature Act 1873, that where there is any variance between the rules of equity and the rules of the law, with reference to the same matter, the rules of equity prevail, are likely to mislead even a careful practitioner where there are no words which confine the comprehensive enactment to the doctrine or principles of equity, as distinguished from its practice. If to the consideration of the words of the section we add that of the important note at the head of the section, that where no other provision is made by the Act the present procedure and practice remain in force, it is in reason; for no provision may be made, and the two codes of practice may be inconsistent as to a given question. A recent case of the Great Australian Gold Mining Co. v. Martin is important in that it directs attention to this as in that it settles the principles upon which leave to serve writ out of the jurisdiction will be granted, while it indicates though the rules of court may be ambiguous, the Chancery office is not necessarily to prevail over the common law, though former was the development of, or the actual rules of the City Courts.

The defendant in the Great Australian Gold Mining Company v. Martin is the Chief Justice of New South Wales. Fraud was ground upon which it was sought to make him amenable to jurisdiction of the English Court. On summons in chambers leave had been granted to serve the writ upon him in New South Wales. Vice-Chancellor Malins refused, after hearing counsel in court, to vary the order.

Rules to regulate service out of the jurisdiction are set out under XI. The third, which has not been expressly superseded, shows that the grounds of the motion must be proved; it is equally clear in showing that the proof need not be by writ. "Every application for leave to serve such writ or on a defendant out of the jurisdiction shall be supported by affidavit or otherwise, showing in what place or country such defendant is or probably may be found, and whether the defendant is British subject or not, and the grounds upon which such application is made." The words "by affidavit or otherwise" are conclusive. But on 26th June, 1876, additional rules were made, which, leaving rule 3 unnoticed, substitute a new rule for it. The substituted rule directs that in the cases mentioned limiting of service of the writ out of the jurisdiction an affidavit stating the particulars necessary for enabling the Judge to exercise his discretion should be produced. Now the cases mentioned do not include cases of fraud like that alleged, and of relief sought, against the defendant. In fact, we are compelled to see that the discussion in court showed that the rules, though now under and published by such high authority, are defective.

Lord Justice James held that the rule of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, s. 18, that there must be an affidavit so far proving the merits as to satisfy the court that a cause of action arose within the jurisdiction must be followed. Baggallay, J.A. differed; he doubted whether sect. 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act required an affidavit on the question as distinct from a cause of action. Those of our readers who have practised in the Common Law Courts may remember how numerous and conflicting were the decisions as to "a cause," "the cause," and "the whole of the cause." His lordship thought that whatever was the proper construction of section 18, the Chancery practice as expounded in McClellan v. Dawson (4 D. & J. 157) was to be followed, and that an affidavit was not requisite. Bramwell, J.A. agreed with Lord Justice James. The court, however, as the question was one of considerable difficulty, gave leave to file the affidavit.

In Young v. Brassey Vice-Chancellor Hall had to consider a similar application, and he came to the same conclusion as the Court of Appeal that there ought to be an affidavit in support. After the still more recent decision of the Great Australian Gold Mining Company v. Martin we should not have called attention to it had it not retained its utility by showing his Lordship's decision as to the further practice arising on the service of the writ out of the jurisdiction. If any interrogatories are filed the order should also provide for their service. And if an injunction is applied for, and the affidavit goes sufficiently to the merits to entitle the plaintiffs thereto, leave at the same time may be obtained for issuing it and serving it with the writ commencing the action. The Vice-Chancellor considered that the deponent could be indicted for perjury upon an affidavit intitled in a now existing action, but thought it desirable that it should be intitled in the matter of the Judicature Acts as well as in the action.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

Readers will have noticed in our last issue report, taken from the Carlisle Patriot, of a meeting among those members of the Bar who attended the Carlisle Quarter Sessions on the 12th Jan. inst. As reported, this undisguised intimation on the part of gentlemen of the robe was because the "honorarium" paid on their briefs in the case of prisoners, was ordered by the Treasury to be £6d. instead of £24s. 6d. as formerly. As we have been expected, we have received several communications from country solicitors who practise at the sessions, and before Justices of the Peace, excepting to this action on the part of the Bar, and asking us to remind members of the Bar that a large number of solicitors consider that they ought to have a right of audience before the sessions of Borough and County Quarter Sessions. Very question was raised by an experienced solicitor (a solicitor) before the Portsmouth High Court of Quarter Sessions not long since, his same solicitor practises as an advocate at the sessions, and other Quarter Sessions. There are, however, a large number of solicitors who so practise in different parts of the country, especially in remote outlying districts, and, as one of our correspondents observes, Carlisle solicitors might be met with a fee of a guinea, inasmuch as they are saved travelling expenses such as which must necessarily be paid by counsel. Short and simple cases less difficult than many cases disposed of in County Courts, we think the Treasury are quite right in refusing to pay a fee than one guinea. The proper and the best course for the Bar to take is not to attend the sessions unless they are content with an "honorarium" as the Treasury choose.

Globe, in its issue of Tuesday last, very prominently, in a tone of adverse criticism, some thing though illegal, and, we are sorry to say, lays commonplace proceedings of self-styled agents, accountants, or debt collectors at Birmingham, which place, being a large centre of trade, is overrun with these people. It seems a tradesman claiming a sum of £16 from a debtor, employed two of these debt collectors, Globe calls them. One of them, on applying payment, threatened to issue process in County Court, while the other, although in a similar threat, offered, by way of an alternative, a reference of the matter in dispute to an arbitrator. The Globe observes, "The two agents were unanimous in assuming the language and authority of legally-qualified practitioners and demanded the payment of their fees." "Unless £— and my fee, 4s. 6d., are paid to me at twelve o'clock to-morrow," wrote one, "I shall put the matter in the County Court." No solicitor would think of charging more than 3s. 6d. for such an application, looking at the amount of the debt. Yet to the uninitiated the application in question would certainly be regarded as emanating from a solicitor's office. The other "agent" wrote: "Unless I receive per return," whatever the words "per return" as here used may mean, "a communication accepting one of three names submitted to you as arbitrator in the dispute between my client (sic) and yourself, I shall commence proceedings for the amount claimed." Notwithstanding the threats used the defendant did not pay, and was successful when the case came before the Birmingham County Court. The Birmingham Post, in referring to this action, reports the learned judge as having said that "the presumption on the part of these men in writing in the way they did, and which they had no right to do, made ignorant people and timid persons alleged to be debtors believe that these debt collectors were in a position to do what they threatened, when they are merely debt collectors." The fact is, County Court judges are only beginning to find out the evils resulting from a bare recognition of the action and conduct of these County Court agents. Had their growth been nipped in the bud years ago they would not now abound as they do in all large towns. If the public like to employ debt collectors to apply for payment of debts we cannot complain, but we do complain that these collectors should be permitted by County Court judges to assume the functions of solicitor, by threatening to do what the Solicitors' Acts expressly forbid, instead of saying in their letters of application that in default of payment the matter will be placed in the hands of a solicitor.

It seems almost too good to be true, but it is reported that Baron Huddleston has gone out of his way to invite the Profession to offer suggestions for the improvement of the present mode of conducting the business of the Common Law Judges' Chambers. We really hope this is the case. So bad is the present system that probably any alteration will prove an improvement. The learned Baron will do well in the first instance to consult a Chancery judge who has had long experience of Chancery Chamber practice, and also take the opinion of one of the senior Chancery chief clerks. Useful information will also be found in abundance in the appendix to the fourth report of the Judicature Commissioners, and lastly, the suggestions of those who have had a long experience of the business at the chambers in Rolls-gardens will deserve serious attention.

THE governing body of the Stock Exchange has recently had under its consideration a somewhat remarkable case, in which a stockbroker complained that in selling certain foreign bonds to a dealer, the latter gave as the market price of such stock a figure lower by three-fourths of a pound per cent. than it in truth was at the time. It is reported that after investigation the Stock Exchange committee passed a vote of censure upon the dealer in connection with the matters complained of. It seems that one of the duties of a stockbroker is, upon a sale of stock, to go to the "board" and get the price of such bargain officially recorded thereon. And it was in this way that the alleged dishonest dealing is said to have been discovered. A case of this kind cannot fail to suggest to the minds of solicitors the importance of employing first-class brokers when dealing with the stocks and shares of clients, that is to say, not only brokers who are in every way entirely above suspicion, but men who will always take the trouble to check the correctness of the market price of stocks or shares sold, as alleged or offered by jobbers or dealers. At the very best, the mode of doing business on the Stock Exchange is loose and unsatisfactory in the eyes of most lawyers, but unless prices are recorded by brokers on the "board" it is positively unsafe.

THE columns of a lay contemporary have been opened lately for a discussion as to the safe keeping of muniments of title, and indeed of all and every kind of document, the loss or destruction of which would prove of serious consequences to those concerned. No doubt in the law and other public offices a fire of an extensive character would in all probability result in irreparable losses by the destruction of all kinds of documents therein deposited. And such losses would in general fall upon the most cautious and careful subjects of Her Majesty, people, that is, who surrender their deeds and documents of value into the custody of public officials for the purpose of their being more securely and safely kept. It has already been pointed out that an extensive fire at the office of the Record and Writ Clerks would lead to the destruction of heaps of tin and wooden boxes containing deeds, &c., of very great value. It should be remembered, too, that in many cases that suitors and others are compelled to bring in their title deeds, &c., volens volens. But this same objection applies in a more modified form to all the law offices, and, indeed, Government offices, as well as the several judges' chambers. A correspondent writing to us upon this subject justly remarks that fireproof safes are now easily procurable, at a small cost as compared with the prices of thirty years ago. There is hardly a solicitor's office in the country in which a large practice is carried on, in which you can fail to notice one or more fireproof safes, used especially for the safe custody of clients' deeds and papers. Arrangements such as those adopted in the Registry of Wills at Somerset House should be adopted in all public offices, especially those law offices in which deeds and documents of value are kept. We hope in our next issue to give a detailed account of the fireproof system at the principal probate registry at Somerset House. It has often been a matter of surprise to us that such comparatively little use is made of the excellent fireproof arrangements at the Law Institution, which offer perfect security, and in which the convenience of solicitors is especially studied. The charges are most moderate.

In our issue of the 6th inst. we called attention to the absence of the taxing master from the common law offices during the whole of the last Christmas Vacation, and pointed out the serious consequences of the delay thus occasioned in many cases. The decision of the Common Pleas Division during the past week in the case of Schroeder v. Cluff, points to a rather distinct cause of complaint in connection with the absence of the taxing master during the vacations. It has been decided in this case that although 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 17, provided that interest shall run from the date of signing judgment, yet that the rules of the Supreme Court must now be read in conjunction with the statute, so that interest can now only be calculated and recovered from the date of the completion of the judgment by inserting the amount of the taxed costs therein. In the present case, the defendant, having obtained a verdict, signed a judgment for his costs. After this decision it is to be hoped that there will always be a master at the common law offices, at all events upon previous appointment taken, to tax costs.

It was not without some misgiving as to the propriety of it, that we published in our last issue (page 196) a letter signed "Charles Connor, A.S.A.E.," who addressed us from Liverpool upon the subject of "Agents practising as Advocates in County Courts." We did so on the ground that our correspondent might perhaps be entitled to some personal explanation by reason of the letter in our previous issue upon the same subject, signed "A Liverpool Solicitor." If anything were wanting to show that "A Liverpool Solicitor's" complaint was well founded, it is furnished in Mr. Connor's letter to us. The complete assurance with which the latter asserts, "I flatter myself that I am as well qualified as any solicitor for such a position," that is, to act as an advocate in a court of justice, as well as that he (Mr. Connor) "instructed Mr. Lowe," has naturally called forth some remonstrance from duly qualified County Court advocates, and we publish in another column a letter upon the subject. Mr. Connor tells us he is "a certificated accountant;" advocacy in County Courts is hardly, then, the direction in which he should look for employment and occupation, and we very much suspect that the learned judge would have positively declined to hear Mr. Connor had he known that the latter belongs to that class of accountants who flatter themselves, in the way stated by Mr. Connor in his letter to us. We hope that his letter, with all its self-assertion, will not escape the attention of the learned judge of the Liverpool court. We doubt whether the "Railway company's detective is a gentleman" whose knowledge of railway law is as great as Mr. Connor suggests, in fact as yet we have nothing but Mr. Connor's own assertion that he is at all capable of forming any kind of opinion as to whether the "detective," or anyone else, is well read in railway law or not. It is to be hoped that upon reflection our correspondent, who is an accountant, feels somewhat ashamed of the way in which he has ventured opinions about himself and others, which, to our mind, are not creditable, and which only found their way into our columns in connection with his application to be allowed to correct a statement of facts addressed to us by a "Liverpool Solicitor," the chief part of whose complaint remains unanswered. We hope another time that the judge will refuse to hear either the accountant or the detective. Mr. Connor is accountant or a bad accountant, in any way or the other, and therefore to say; but his claims to some of the qualifications of a lawyer are simply preposterous, and must have occasioned some amusement to the solicitor, if not to a certain section of accountants in Liverpool.

SOLICITORS IN PARTNERSHIP.

In all matters within the range of the partnership business, each partner is the agent of the other, and each has accordingly authority to bind the others by his acts and representations in such matters.

See Bourdillon v. Roche, 27 L. J. 681, Ch.

Plumer v. Gregory, L. Rep. 18 Eq. 621.

A member of a firm has no implied authority to bind his partner by a note or bill in the name of the firm, though given for their debt.

Hedley v. Bainbridge, 3 Q.B. 318.

Nor has a member any authority to sign an undertaking in the name of the firm for the payment of the amount of the debt and costs to the plaintiff in an action, in order to procure the discharge of the defendant.

Hasteham v. Young, 13 L. J. 205, Q.B.

ACT OF SOLICITOR—HOW FAR BINDING ON CLIENT.

Where a solicitor, acting in the ordinary course of practice exceeds the secret instructions of his client, the act of the solicitor, if within his apparent authority, will be binding upon the client so far as third parties are concerned, provided there is no collusion or fraud.

La Touche v. Pashen, 1 B. & C. 86.

Illustration.

A., the defendant, expressly forbids her attorney to refer the cause to arbitration. The attorney does refer the cause, contrary to her instructions, and the cause is referred, by order of Nisi Prius. The court will refuse to set the order of reference aside, though the application to do so be made before any step taken by the arbitrators, except the appointment of a meeting.

Filmer v. Dalber, 3 Taunt. 486.

Lord Mansfield said, "Here is an express agreement to refer properly entered into by counsel and attorney. It is now said that they had no authority to enter into that agreement. If so, the defendant's remedy is by action against her attorney. There would be no end to those applications if the court were to interfere. Such interferences would lead to collusion. When a party did not like the prospect of the reference he would say that he had never given his attorney authority to refer."

Note.

No agreement between any solicitors relating to any of their client's causes shall be capable of being enforced unless and until such agreement, or some note or memorial thereof be put into writing and subscribed by the party who is to be bound thereby, or his solicitor.

PRIVILEGES OF SOLICITORS.

A solicitor of the Supreme Court has the following privileges:

1. Exemption from filling any office where personal service is required: c.g.

1. As constables, R. v. Routledge, 2 Doug. 538.

2. Offices under Commissioners of Sewers, collectors of subsidies, watch and ward, and the like, Ex parte Jeffries, 6 Bing. 195; Gerard's case, 2 W. Bl. 1126.

3. Corporation offices, Mayor of Norwich v. Barry, 1 W. Bl. 636.

4. As jurymen, 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, s. 2.

5. As titheingmen, Gerard's case (sup.).

6. In the trained bands of London, Keington's case, Str. 1143.

Note.

It is immaterial whether the office is one that exists at common law or is created by special custom or even by Act of Parliament.

Lush's Practice, 1, 337; Ch. Practice, 1, 78.

An attorney, being copyholder of a manor in which there was a custom for the homage to choose one of the tenants to be the lord's reeve, was elected reeve, but the court granted him a writ of privilege.

Stone's case, 1 Vent. 16, 19.

No privilege exists in the following cases:

(1) Where the solicitor is ballotted for the militia:

Gerard's case (sup.).

Note.

The reason of this was that since 3 Geo. 3 c. 20, s. 42, allowed a commutation of service into a payment of £10, the service was no longer personal:

2 Str. 1143;

Erindon's case was decided on the 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 3.

(2) Where he is arrested on final process nor under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110:

Flight v. Cook, 1 D. & L. 714.

2. Where he obtained judgment in an action to which he was a party he was allowed, before the passing of the Judicature Acts, the same costs as if he had conducted the action as attorney for another person, and in ordinary cases will [probably] be still allowed them:

Jervois v. Davies, 4 Dowl. 784;

Parsons v. Foy, 2 Dowl. 181.

3. Where he acts as an advocate his privilege, like that of counsel, will extend to any made by him reasonably relevant to the dispute:

Mackay v. Ford, 29 L. J. 404, Ex.

The consent of his client, disclose in any communication made by the client his professional capacity necessary for the matter or proceeding the solicitor employed:

Note.

The privilege being that of the client, the solicitor, who is liable to an action for disclosures, the whole subject may be more properly considered when the duties of their clients are considered.

ARTICLE 41.

DURATION OF THE PRIVILEGE.

The privileges of a solicitor continue as he is a practising solicitor:

Brooks v. Bryant, 7 T. R. 25.

Note.

Hence if a solicitor has left off practice (v. Baynard, 2 Wils. 332), or is in prison (Ex parte, 4 B. & Ald. 88) his privileges are at an end. An omission to take out a certificate itself deprive him of these privileges.

Nixon v. Hewitt, 10 Moore, 270.

RIGHT OF SOLICITORS TO ACT AS ADVOCATES.

No person has a right to act as an advocate without the leave of the Court, which necessarily have the power of regulating proceedings in all cases where they are already regulated by ancient usage. Superior Courts, by ancient usage, only who have been called to the bar are allowed to practise as advocates; but justices of the peace who are not bound by such usage, may, at their discretion whether they will allow what persons to act as advocates before them. The court will not interfere with a decision which appeared to have been soundly given, e.g., when the justices in quarter sessions that when a certain number of barristers they shall have exclusive audience.

Solicitors of the High Court of Chancery, as well as solicitors of the Court of Bankruptcy, are allowed to practise in the latter court, or any Court of Bankruptcy, as well as to plead being required to employ counsel.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 131, s. 212.

"The business of an attorney," said Lord (in May v. O'Neill, 41 L. J. 600, Ch.) "is to transact every common law court in the kingdom. It is to practise in the Court of Bankruptcy is not business."

An attorney of any of the Superior Courts, being an attorney acting generally in an action or proceeding in a County Court, but not being an attorney retained as such by such first mentioned advocate, and any right of exclusive audience or privilege may address the court, subject to such directions as the judge may prescribe for the transaction of the business of the court: 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, s. 10.

3. He cannot be a master, nor an agent or messenger to a master, of the Superior Courts: 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 30, s. 15.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S-INN.

Saturday, Jan. 13.

Before JAMES, L.J., and BAGGALLAY and BRAMWELL, JJ.A.)

EDOCK v. WARNER: WARNER v. MURDOCK.
Trial by jury—How to be tried—Entries in London and Middlesex.

There was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, and it raised the important question whether, when an action commenced in the Chancery Division of the High Court is to be tried by a jury, it is to be tried before the judge to whom the court it is attached with a jury, or whether it is to be set down in the general list of cases for trial by jury (in London or Middlesex the assizes, as the case may be) and to come on for trial in its turn before the judge who is then to be trying actions, i.e., as matters at present, a judge of one of the Common Divisions. This question has been very much discussed of late, but was not till to-day decided by the Court of Appeal, though Hall, V.C., time since, in a case of Clarke v. Cookson (N. Div. 740), held that such an action must take its place in the General List, and not be in the Chancery Division, and in the present case the Master of the Rolls followed that opinion.

First of the above actions was brought by the executors of a gentleman who had effected a policy of insurance upon his life in the United London Temperance and General Provident Association, to recover from that company the amount of the policy. The second action was brought by the trustees of the company to have the policy set aside on the ground that it had been obtained by means of misrepresentations. The two actions were consolidated, and the Master of the Rolls ordered that the consolidated actions should be tried before a special jury. Application was then made to him for an order that the case should be set down for trial before himself by jury. His Lordship, following the decision in Clarke v. Cookson, refused the application. The result of the company appealed.

By Q.C. and Kekewich, for the appellants, it was contended that the jurisdiction which the Court of Appeal formerly possessed under the Acts of 1850 and 1851, as Lord Cairns' Act and Sir John Rolfe's Act, gave it jurisdiction to try cases which had been tried by the Judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court. They also contended, upon the construction of the existing rules of court, that it was in fact the Judges of the Chancery Division who tried their own actions with the aid of a jury when necessary.

For the respondents, it was contended that the order of the Master of the Rolls could not be disturbed. It was really no question of jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery formerly possessed has now to be exercised by the Court. The question was merely one of procedure, and no one had any vested right in any particular kind of procedure. A suitor had no right now to require that his case should be tried by a Judge of the Chancery Division than he had to require that it should be tried by a particular Judge of the Court of Chancery, or that it should be transferred from one Judge to another. Under the present practice, all kinds of cases might be brought in the Chancery Division. When a case was ready for trial it was wholly immaterial by what officer of the Court it was entered for trial. Order XXXVI. said that when no place for trial was named in the statement of claim, the trial should, unless otherwise ordered, be in Middlesex. It was to his Lordship that exactly the same question was to be pursued in all the Divisions. If it was a London case it would be tried at the London sittings; if a Middlesex case, at the Middlesex sittings. All the actions for trial were to be set down in one general list, without regard to the division in which they were commenced, and each action would be tried by that Judge to whom the duty was allotted for actions upon the day on which it came its turn for trial. That appeared to his Lordship to be the plain construction of the Act of 1851, and he thought there was no difficulty whatever in carrying it out. He thought the difficulty in the argument lay in supposing that the suitor in the Chancery Division had a right to have his case tried in a different mode from the cases of the sutors in the other divisions.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. was of the same opinion. He thought that the intention of the Legislature was that all actions which were to be tried by jury, and which were not to be tried at the assizes, should be set down in one list for trial in London or Middlesex. The provisions of sects. 29 and 30 of the Act of 1873 for trial by jury were perfectly general in their nature, and made no distinction between actions which arose in the Chancery Division, and actions which arose in other divisions. Up to these sections the Act contained no provisions for the separation of the High Court into divisions. That was done by sect. 31. Then sect. 37 provided that the sittings for trial by jury in London and Middlesex and at the assizes should be held before judges of the three Common Law Divisions, and there was power for Her Majesty to include in any Commission of Assize any judge of the Chancery Division to be appointed after the commencement of the Act. That section applied to all the trials by jury which had been previously provided for. This view of the Act was confirmed by the provisions of Order XXXVI. His Lordship referred to rules 1 and 8 of that Order, and especially to rule 18, which provides that "the lists of actions for trial at the sittings in London and Middlesex respectively shall be prepared and the actions shall be allotted for trial, without reference to the Division of the High Court to which such actions may be attached." That rule contained no distinction: it applied to the Chancery Division equally with the other divisions. His Lordship thought, therefore, upon the construction of the Act and the rules that the intention was that a trial by jury should be held before a judge of one of the common law divisions, from whatever division the action might come, and the inconvenience of a trial of a Chancery action before a judge of a common law division would be no greater than that of a trial of a Queen's Bench action before a judge of the Exchequer or Common Pleas Division. It was urged that the rules contained no provisions for the making of applications for new trials in actions attached to the Chancery Division, and that this showed that the other provisions were not intended to apply to actions in that division. But that was because the old practice of the Court of Chancery was intended to remain in that respect, the application for a new trial being made to the judge to whose court the action was attached, or to the Court of Appeal. His Lordship thought the view taken by the Master of the Rolls was not only consistent with the Act and the rules, but also that it would most promote the public convenience that all trials of actions should be heard in one place.

BRAMWELL, L.J., concurred. He wished to make two observations. It had been argued on behalf of the appellants that the provision of sect. 37, that trials by jury should be held before judges of the three Common Law Divisions showed that it was intended to apply only to actions commenced in those Divisions. If that were so, one could hardly see why there need have been a provision that the cases should be tried by judges of these Divisions only; the provision seemed to imply that they would have to try cases coming from the Chancery Division also. The other observation was this. The new Rule 4 of December 1876, provided that "where in any action in the Chancery Division, the action, or any question at issue in the action, is ordered to be tried before any commissioner or commissioners of assize, or at the London or Middlesex sittings of any Division other than the Chancery Division, the order directing such trial shall state on its face the reason for which it is expedient that the action, question, or issue should be so tried, and should not be tried in the Chancery Division." It did not follow that this rule assumed that there were to be jury sittings in the Chancery Division in London or Middlesex, for there were sittings of that Division for the trial of actions without juries. That rule did not apply to a case where no order was made for the trial of the action, but where it went, so to speak, of his own accord to be tried at the Middlesex sittings by reason of there being no local venue. The rule only applied when the action was ordered to be tried, as under Rules 6 and 29 of Order XXXVI. In those cases the judge was to state a reason for making the order. But that did not apply when the case went to be tried of its own accord.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

(Before MELLOR and LUSH, JJ.)

BUSINESS OF THE COURT—ARRANGEMENTS UNDER THE NEW ACT—SITTINGS OF SINGLE JUDGES.

THE court, as thus constituted, continued to hear motions, and then to take the applications for new trials which had stood over from last sittings in cases tried before the 1st Dec. last, when the enactment in the Act of last session came into operation. That enactment provided that from that day every action and all business arising out of it shall, so far as is practicable and convenient, be heard and disposed of before a single judge, and that all proceedings subsequent to the trial and down to and including final judgment, shall, as far as practicable and convenient, be before the judge who tried the case. This enactment, of which the first part applied to proceedings before trial, and the latter part to proceedings upon trial, did not come into operation until the 1st Dec., and, therefore, as to cases tried then, the motions to be made, and the applications pending have still to be disposed of before Divisional Courts, constituted, however, of two judges only. As to the cases tried after the 1st Dec., the second part of the enactment came into operation, and the judges accordingly either directed judgment to be entered on the verdict being given or adjourned the cases for further consideration; and several of these cases tried before the judges at the Guildhall sittings, and adjourned for that purpose, are now pending. Some of these were tried before two judges of this court, Field and Manisty, JJ., and some before Lord Coleridge and one or two other judges; and Lord Coleridge and Field, J. intimated that arrangements would be made at the next—that is the present—sittings for the hearing of these cases. These arrangements could hardly be made until after the first four or five days of the sittings, within which the motions for new trials are to be made which require to be made before Divisional Courts; and with three Divisional Courts, each constituted of two judges, and six courts of Nisi Prius, twelve judges would be occupied, while one, at least, would be required at Chambers, and one—that is, one of the chiefs—is sitting in the Court of Appeal. To-day important announcements were made upon the subject.

The learned judges announced at the sitting of the court that, in consequence of the inability to find any court at all possible for the discharge of business other than the courts hitherto in use by this Division, they found to their regret that it would be utterly impossible to comply with the spirit of the new Act, that one judge only should sit to hear the special paper on Tuesday next, except where two judges are desired by the parties, and, at the same time, to find occupation for all the judges. Their lordships therefore thought that, in these unfortunate circumstances the only arrangement open to them until accommodation is provided is that two judges should sit in Banco instead of one only. Their lordships also announced that, Mr. Justice Field having arranged to hear questions reserved for argument before him on Friday next, the course of Nisi Prius would not be thereby interrupted, but another judge would proceed with Nisi Prius during the time Mr. Justice Field would be so engaged. This announcement having been made, the court proceeded to take motions in cases pending.

NIGER MERCHANTS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NORRIS.

Pleading—Counter claim—Payment into Court.

THIS case raised a question under the new procedure. The action was by the company against a ship and insurance broker to recover a policy of insurance for the sum of £1000, effected by him for them. He pleaded in denial of the claim and also set up a counter claim of a lien on the policy for £570, alleged to be due from the company to him on his general balance as ship and insurance broker, and "also large balances in other respects." The plaintiffs finding, as they said, a difficulty in distinguishing what items of the counter claim were set up as involving a lien on the policy, applied at Chambers for an order on the defendant to specify the items of his claim on which he relied as supporting a lien; but the Master before whom the summons came dismissed it with costs. Thereupon they paid £135 into Court generally on the general balance claimed. Then the defendant, in his turn, applied to a judge at chambers for an order on the plaintiffs to amend their pleading to the counter claim by specifying the items on which they paid the money into Court, but the learned judge dismissed the summons. The defendant now appealed to this court for such an order.

W. A. Lewis, on the part of the defendant, urged in support of his application that it was impossible for him to know on what parts of his counter claim the lien was admitted.

Cruick, on the part of the plaintiff, urged that they could not tell from the defendant's counter claim on what items the lien was set up, so that the fault was in the pleading of the defendant, and, after some discussion,

THE COURT were of that opinion, observing that the object of the new system was that there should be no concealment on either side, nothing to cause needless obscurity or difficulty. There was no doubt as to the lien of an insurance broker for moneys paid by him, and, therefore, the counter-claim should distinguish on what items of the claim moneys were so paid so as to raise such a lien, and then the plaintiffs could have no difficulty in paying into court on specific items.

DAY V. STANFORD.

Taxation of costs—Application to review for breach of faith—Additional rules 30, 32.
On an application to review a taxation of costs which had not been objected to on ground of breach of faith:

Held, that the Master's allocatur was final.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Denman, J. at chambers refusing to order a review of taxation of costs which was made ex parte, and was alleged to have been obtained through a breach of faith.

Cook, for the defendant, asked for a general review of taxation on the ground that the Master exercised no discretion, but simply adopted the bill presented by the plaintiff; there being thus no real taxation. A day had been fixed for taxation, and the parties afterwards agreed to defer it to another day. On the latter day one of the parties was absent and the other procured an excessive bill.

Dodd, for the plaintiff.—The Master's allocatur is final and conclusive as to all matters not objected to.

The COURT (Grove and Denman, JJ.).—This is a subject of review, and not of appeal. The proper course, by Additional Rule 30, was to have gone before the Master, alleging that the allocatur was improperly obtained. That course has not been taken. Additional Rule 32 makes the Master's allocatur final.

HARRIS V. THE FRANCONIA (OWNERS OF).

Writ of summons—Application for leave to serve abroad—Action under Lord Campbell's Act—Order XI., rule 1.

THIS was a motion to set aside an order for service of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction under Order XI., rule 1. The action was for damages under Lord Campbell's Act. The defendants were a foreign corporation; and the life in question was lost in consequence of a collision at sea of the ships Strathclyde and Franconia, two miles and a half from Dover.

Benjamin, Q.C. for the defendants.—The question here is whether the court is bound by the decision in the case of Reg. v. Keyn. The action is a personal one, and the cause of it arose without the jurisdiction, which, it is admitted on all sides at common law only extends to low water mark. If any jurisdiction extends to the three mile radius, it must be that of the Court of Admiralty, and the creature of a statute. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 527, is the only instance of jurisdiction being given to an English court to take cognizance of injuries sustained beyond the realm. That section empowers a judge of a court of record, or of the Court of Admiralty, to arrest a foreign ship which has caused an injury to any property belonging to a British subject in any part of the world, if at any time thereafter such ship is found within three miles of the British coast, and to order its detention until the owner has made satisfaction. This section gives no power to try a personal action against a foreign owner, the remedy given being only in rem.; besides, it only concerns injuries done to property, and not loss of life. As to the circumstances of this case: The ship was seized, a collision suit instituted, and the full sum of £8 per ton paid by way of damages. The ship was subsequently released upon bail being given to the extent of a further sum of £7 per ton to answer damages for personal injuries which may be given in any future action against the vessel. Scott v. Royal Wax Candle Company (L. Rep. 1, Q. B. D. 404) shows that a foreign corporation may be served abroad the same as an individual.

Cohen Q.C., on the same side.—Under Order XI., rule 1, power is given to serve a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction where "any act or thing . . . for which damages are sought to be recovered was . . . done . . . within the jurisdiction." That rule does not cover the present case. If the Legislature wished to give the court jurisdiction in cases like the present, it might do so without any violation of international law; but it has not done so. The argument that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty is an amalgamation of all the courts, every division of the High Court, saying that the rules of procedure the High Court authority to act in cases where the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction.

Dr. Phillimore and Stubbs were also engaged in the same interest.

Clarkson (Butt, Q.C. and Webster with him) for the plaintiff.—The wrong complained of was done within the jurisdiction of the Queen of England, and I am thus enabled to rely upon the decision of some of the learned judges in the case of Reg. v. Keyn. I do not rely upon the 527th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, because the authority of the Legislature to pass that section was the territorial jurisdiction of Her Majesty.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is a motion to set aside an order for service of a writ of summons abroad. I am of opinion that the order should be set aside. It is quite plain that the judgment of the full court in the Franconia case is binding upon all the courts. The ratio decidendi is that for all purposes, where an extension is not expressly made by Act of Parliament, England stops at low water mark; and, therefore, the jurisdiction of the Queen and her courts stops there also. The cause of action in this case, therefore, arose beyond the jurisdiction of the Queen; and I do not think that Order XI., rule 1, enables us to order service to be made there. As to the section of the Merchant Shipping Act which has been quoted, it has no application to this case. It only gives a specific remedy under special circumstances, and the circumstances which occurred are not such circumstances.

GROVE, J.—I think we are bound by the opinion of the majority of the judges in the Franconia case, unless it can be shown that the section of the Act alluded to, or Order XI. rule 1, enacts something to the contrary. The present case is not an action in respect of damage to property to which the section is limited, and we cannot extend a statutory remedy in the manner required of us. Order XI. rule 1, does not extend the jurisdiction, but leaves it where it stood at common law, whose jurisdiction the High Court succeeds.

DENMAN, J.—I referred this case into court because I considered it important, and that it was not right to dispose of such a question at chambers as whether the decisions of the Court of Criminal Appeal apply to cases of injury by loss of life. Mr. Clarkson failed to point out any reason which absolves us from following Reg. v. Keyn, whilst the Order XI. rule 1, it is clear, only gives the court jurisdiction when the "act or thing . . . for which damages are sought to be recovered was . . . done . . . within the jurisdiction." The case of Reg. v. Keyn decides that for all purposes, except those excluded by statute, or within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, the jurisdiction of the court ceases at low water mark. We have no jurisdiction, therefore, to give leave to serve the writ.

LORD MAYOR'S COURT.

(Before W. BRANDON, Esq., Assistant Judge.)

TYWYFORD V. SEEAR (BUFFEN, GARNISHEE).

Accountant's charges.

THE plaintiff in this action, a member of the firm of Messrs. Brettell and Co., sought to attach a sum of £101 7s. 11d., in the hands of the garnishee.

Bucknell appeared for the plaintiff.

Kemp for the garnishee.

Bucknell stated that the garnishee, Mr. Buffen, accountant, acted professionally in winding-up the estate of Mr. Seear, and in that capacity disposed of the lease and fixtures of his shop in the Kingsland-road in September last. The plaintiff's firm were creditors of the defendants for a larger amount than all the other creditors together. At the date of the attachment the garnishee had paid away on behalf the debtor a sum of £261 2s. 1d., out of the proceeds of the lease, but there remained the sum now claimed in his hands. He refused to part with this unless his charges, amounting to £35 12s. 8d. were paid, so that the real point in dispute was the amount of these charges, which were considered by plaintiff to be excessive.

Mr. Buffen, in cross-examination, said that he had much trouble in negotiating the sale of the business, which could not be disposed of till he took it in hand, and thus created what estate there was for the creditors. He had charged at the rate of two guineas per day of eight hours for himself, that being the charge recognised by the Bankruptcy Court. He had charged a guinea and a half per day for a first clerk; but he admitted that might be considered an overcharge, as it was usual to charge only a guinea. A second clerk he had charged at a guinea per day. The third clerk mentioned in the accounts was his errand boy, charged at half a guinea a day. His wages were about 8s. per week.

Kemp submitted that Mr. Buffen was entitled to make a good profit out of the his clerks and others, as his rent and had to come out of the amount.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff the sum of £86 7s., thus in effect reducing accountant's charges by £20.

COUNTY COURTS.

SWINDON COUNTY COURT.

(Before C. F. D. CAILLARD, Esq., Judge.)
MOFFATT v. ADAMS.Trover—Right of owner of goods pledged by bailee to recover against pawnbroker—Pawnbroker's Act 1872.

Foote appeared for the plaintiff.

Henry Bevir appeared for the defendant.

A case of very considerable importance to owners of goods which have been wrongfully pawned, has been decided in this court, and the learned judge having had the case twice argued before him, and having taken time for consideration, has delivered the following carefully prepared and exhaustive judgment.

His HONOUR.—In this case a question of very considerable importance is raised between the owners of goods and chattels which have been wrongfully pawned, on the one hand, and pawnbrokers by whom such goods have been taken in pledge without notice of the wrong, on the other. The question arises under the Pawnbrokers' Act 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 93. There is no dispute about the facts, which are as follows: The plaintiff, who represents a sewing machine company, let a sewing machine to one Frederick Ellis, under the terms of an agreement in writing, which was signed by him, and is in these words:

Memorandum of an agreement made the sixth day of June 1876, between James Moffatt, of Wine-street and Middle-street, Yeovil, hereinafter called the owner, of the one part, and Frederick Ellis, 18, Cromwell-street, Swindon, hereinafter called the hirer, of the other part: Witnesseth that the owner agrees to let, and the hirer agrees to hire, the Singer Medium Sewing Machine, No. 83390, mentioned on the back hereof, at the rental of 10s. per month, for the term of fifty-eight weeks, from the date hereof, on the conditions following, viz.:

1. The hirer agrees with the owner as follows:
  - A. To pay 5s. receiving the machine, and 2s. 6d. every Saturday of each of the weeks inclusive during the said term.
  - B. To keep the said machine in good order, fair wear excepted.
  - C. At all times to allow the said owner or his agents to inspect the machine.
  - D. Not to assign, underlet, or otherwise part with the said machine, or remove the same from the above-mentioned address, without in every case the previous consent in writing of the owners.
  - E. That if the hirer do not duly perform and observe this agreement, the owners may re-take possession, by force or otherwise, without prejudice to his right to recover arrears of rent and damages for breach of this agreement.
2. The owner agrees with the hirer as follows:
  - A. The hirer may terminate the hire by giving to the owner one week's notice, and at the end thereof delivering up the said machine to him.
  - B. The hirer may at any time purchase by a cash payment the said machine at the price mentioned on the back hereof, in which case credit shall be given for the full amount of rent paid.
3. The parties hereto expressly agree that the hirer shall in no case be entitled to any credit for the said rent or any part thereof, except on purchase of the said machine, under the provisions of paragraph B., clause 2, and that the said machine and accessories shall otherwise remain the property of the owner, subject to the provisions of this agreement only, and that until purchase the hirer shall be the bailee only of the said machine. As witness the hand of the hirer.

The machine was delivered to Ellis accordingly, and he, after paying the hire for some weeks, became a defaulter. He then pawned the machine to the defendant and absconded, and he cannot be found. It is admitted that the defendant acted with perfect good faith; that he is a pawnbroker, and that on application to him by the plaintiff's agent, the defendant refused to deliver up the machine. The pawn ticket is not forthcoming, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary is presumed to be in the hands of Ellis. Under these circumstances, the present action was brought, and at the hearing beyond the above admissions, it was agreed that the value of the machine should be taken at £5 19s., and the damages of detention at 1s. It is not in contest, and indeed it could not be, that, having regard to the terms of the agreement, the hirer was a bailee only of the machine, and that by pawning it he determined the bailment, so that (the Act of 1872 apart) the plaintiff, the bailor, could maintain trover for the machine: (Cooper v. Wellomatt, 14 L. J. 219, C. P.) The case was first argued somewhat briefly, but by arrangement it was at a subsequent court argued more fully and with greater care. For the plaintiff, it was argued by Mr. Foote, that he could proceed altogether independently of the Pawnbrokers' Act 1872, and assert his common law right, and to his paramount title against the defendant. Several cases were cited, which were White v. Pettigrew, 14 L. J. 99, Ex.; Parker v. Gillies, 11 Starlin, 471.

Borough, 42 L. J. 122, C. P. (same cause); 38 L. T. Rep. N.S. 115.) Mr. Bevir, for the defendant, argued that the present case is entirely governed by the Pawnbrokers' Act 1872, the provisions of which are not analogous to those of the old Act, which did not provide for the return of the goods to the owner, that the plaintiff has under the Act 1872 a full remedy before justices, and so cannot maintain this action, Sects. 25, 26, and 30 of this Act were particularly insisted upon, as ousting the plaintiff's common law right. In reply for plaintiff, Mr. Foote argued that this sect. 3 did not apply till conviction, and this, under the existing circumstances, would leave the plaintiff without a remedy; that sect. 25 raises only a presumption, which is here rebutted by the admitted facts; and that sect. 26 is limited in its application so far, as at all events, not to take away the plaintiff's prima facie rights in common law, which are anterior to those of the holder of the ticket; that sect. 29 of the Act of 1872 is also limited in its application, and that it is not open to the plaintiff, under the circumstances of the present case, to proceed summarily under the Act, so that if he could not sue at common law he would be without remedy; but that even if he had a remedy under the Act that would not deprive him of the other, and he might proceed by either course, at his option. Upon consideration, I am of opinion that, notwithstanding the apparently strong language of the 26th section of the Act 1872, which would prima facie lead one to suppose that, unless the pawn ticket is delivered to him, or "except as in this Act provided," a pawnbroker shall not be bound to deliver back a pledge, the plaintiff in the case before me is entitled to judgment. Section 25 enacts that the holder, for the time being, of a pawn ticket shall be presumed to be the person entitled to redeem the pledge; and, subject to the provisions of the Act, the pawnbroker shall accordingly (on payment of the loan and profit) deliver the pledge to the person producing the pawn ticket, and is indemnified by that section for so doing. The plaintiff is not the holder of the ticket, and I quite agree that it is a presumption only which is raised by that section, and which is rebutted by the facts here existing. He cannot proceed, therefore, under that section, nor can the pawn ticket be delivered to the pawnbroker, as indicated by the 26th section; but then the question is whether the plaintiff, who has not the ticket, must come in under the exception contained in that section or be remediless. The first exception having a bearing on this case is that under the 29th section, which enacts that "for protection of owners of articles pawned . . . any person claiming to be the owner of a pledge . . . may apply to the pawnbroker for a printed form" of declaration, which the pawnbroker shall deliver to him, and on delivering "back to the pawnbroker the declaration, with the formalities and within the time prescribed, the applicant is to have, as between him and the pawnbroker, all the same rights and remedies as if he produced the pawn ticket." This, in effect, puts the owner in the position of the holder of a ticket under sect. 25, and so compels him to pay to the pawnbroker "the loan and profit." But I think the 29th section gives the owner an option: he may proceed in that manner; he certainly is not, by force of that section alone, compelled either to lose the property or to pay the amount of the loan and profit. I think the 26th section, when pointing to that exception, should not be so construed as to work an injustice by making compulsory a provision which, in itself, is optional only, and, as I apprehend, is intended to give to owners a special protection and remedy, if they choose to adopt it, but not to take away any other which they may have. Taking next the 30th section, 1st and 2nd sub-sections of it are evidently inapplicable to a state of circumstances such as the present. Since Ellis, the hirer and pawnbroker, cannot be found, and since also the defendant being an innocent person, no criminal proceedings can be taken against him, nor need any be taken against Ellis by the plaintiff as a condition precedent to the maintaining of an action by him against the defendant: (White v. Pettigrew, 14 L. J. 99, Ex.) Sub-sect. 3 of sect. 30 points, I think, to the event of its incidentally appearing in any proceedings before a court of summary jurisdiction other than proceedings under the Act itself, "that any goods and chattels brought before the court have been unlawfully pawned with a pawnbroker." If so, then the court, on proof of the ownership of the goods and chattels, can order delivery of the goods to the owner, either without payment of the loan or any part thereof to the pawnbroker, "as to the court, according to the conduct" of the owner, and the other "circumstances of the case seems just and fitting." I think this construction of the 3rd sub-section of sect. 30 is borne not only by the context of the 1st and 2nd sub-sections but also by the 31st section. This enacts that, "If a pawnbroker without reasonable excuse (proof thereof shall lie on him) neglects or refuses to deliver a pledge to the person entitled to have delivery thereof under this Act, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and a court of summary jurisdiction may, if the court thinks fit, with or without imposing a penalty, order the delivery of the pledge on payment of the amount of the loan and profit." Obviously, proceedings under the 31st section are not in the contemplation of the 3rd sub-section, sect. 30, because under the 31st section must be payment of the loan and profit, whereas under the 3rd sub-section of sect. 30 it is at the discretion of the court to order whether it shall be any or not. The 31st section, in relation to the refusal of a pawnbroker to deliver a pledge "to the person entitled to have delivery thereof under this Act" points, in my opinion, to persons so entitled within the definitions of the 25th or the 29th sections. I think the meaning of the 26th section is that the pawnbroker shall not under this Act be bound to deliver a pledge, by means of any proceedings under the Act be compellable to deliver back a pledge to any person unless such person comes within sect. 25, and fulfils the condition of delivering a ticket under sect. 26, or comes within sect. 29, unless under the circumstances incidental to sect. 30. So that the Act leaves untouched such remedies as may exist independently of the Act itself. I have already said that I think not incumbent on the plaintiff to bring a case within the conditions of sect. 29 as claiming to be the owner of a pledge, and holding the pawn ticket. It would be indeed if he were thus bound to pay the loan and profit, whilst under the proceedings relating to sub-sect. 3 of sect. 30, which appear not depend upon himself, he might get back which is his own without any payment at all these reasons I am of opinion that the Act has not ousted the common law rights and remedies of the plaintiff, and that by means of which is paramount to that of the pawnbroker. Lord Ellenborough in Pest v. Baxter, which is successfully to maintain this action against a defendant.

EXAMINATIONS FOR THE BAR.—DURHAM "CRIBBING."—Permit me through these columns to draw the attention of the Editors of Legal Education to the disgraceful and "cribbing" which took place at the examination for the Bar. I was present on the days during which the examination was held, viz., Jan. 1st, 2nd, and 3rd. The examination being somewhat closely engaged with the law, I was not in a position to observe the proceedings of my neighbours; on the second day, with leisure to look about, I found note books on both sides of me; on the last day, I handed in my paper, the common law was after eleven, I had, whilst awaiting my turn, a viu voce, an opportunity of seeing what was going on. One instance will suffice: A "man" at the same table as myself, not without constant reference to three bulky manuscript notes laid on the table and pocket handkerchief and blotting paper, for quite an hour a printed book which he held in his knees. This book was, I believe, a Manual of Common Law. Now, sir, it may be said against the necessity for an examination in law as a qualification for a call to the bar, it is manifest that an examination so easily evaded may fail to secure the acquisition of potent knowledge of the subjects by those who pass. The viu voce doubtless out a few of those who rely alone on "crib" but even that test fails when the same questions are asked before and after the examination is certainly sometimes the case. It will, I think, be asked how it is that such open resort to script and printed matter is not detected and think when I state that in the two men detailed for this purpose I recognised the student of the waiters at dinner in Lincoln and the man who puts on our gowns, the question is sufficiently answered. These are not men to act as censors at an examination candidates for the Bar. In conclusion, I say that it bodes ill for the continued reputation hitherto accorded to the Bar, so many students unblushingly resort to means of passing the examination. This really important aspect of the case.

AN EYE WIT.

LADY LAW STATIONERS.—Will you allow through your columns to advocate the cause upon the legal Profession of an institution which is far less widely known than its merits? The Association for the Employment of aw Copying," now carrying on business at 12, Portugal-street, Lincoln's inn, was established some sixteen years since, with a view to a remunerative, and at the same time, occupation for ladies. Those who know many ladies there are who, nurtured in idleness, are suddenly, through no fault of their own, compelled to seek a livelihood, will appreciate the value of such an institution; but, apart from all this, I feel sure that any solicitor who sends work to 12, Portugal-street, will do so to the advantage of his business. The writing is equal to that sent out by the best law stationers; while as to the accuracy and punctuality they are far surpassed, while the prices are those usually paid. It is the earnest desire of the lady proprietress, Mrs. Lunter, to take larger premises, and to provide occupation for a larger number of ladies, and she can only do so if she obtains further assistance. Mrs. Lunter can, if requisite, furnish names to some of the most eminent conveyancing firms in this neighbourhood, who have long been her work, and who will testify to the skill which it has been performed.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

THE LEGAL PROFESSION AND PRINTING.—Remarks of Mr. Wordsworth on the subject of parliamentary printing, which you publish in issue of the 13th inst., serve to give point to action I propose to ask: Why should not the legal profession do its own printing? If it is remembered that the already large amount of printing required for Parliament, for public commissions, and for the courts, has been greatly increased during the past few years, and that the cost of this is distributed by solicitors, it will be what a fruitful field here is for the application of co-operative principles. There seems to be no reason why this work should not be done, the profits earned, by a company composed of members of the legal profession, the consequent advantages both to clients and solicitors would be considerable. There is no doubt that such a company could afford materially to reduce the cost of printing in several departments, while it ought to secure another improvement, equally important, in the substitution of printed forms for the present haphazard productions of law stationers. There appears to be difficulty in the way of carrying out this suggestion, and I can only attribute the fact that solicitors have been content to make the fortunes of law stationers, to want of organisation in our ranks of the profession. I think the suggestion requires the approval of the LAW TIMES, and the active support of two or three large London firms, to secure its realisation.

B. CARLILL.

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.—In reference to this society a few weeks back you asked that, in your opinion, we did not discuss a sufficient number of legal points, and our treasurer subsequently explained that this arose from the fact that there was no law library attached to the society's inn Hall, our place of meeting, but the committee had determined upon taking certain steps to form a law library. In addition to this I may add that application has been made to the council of the Incorporated Law Society for permission for our society to meet at the Law Institution, for the discussion of legal points, and now we refer to the books in their library at the meetings. I am happy to say the council has generously acceded to this application. As, therefore, as our society has formally sanctioned the alterations necessary in our rules, it is now (assuming the same are sanctioned, of which there can be little doubt) to hold two meetings a month (probably the second and fourth day in each month, at the Law Institution, in addition to our Wednesday evening meetings in the inn Hall. I feel sure our members will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity of discussing legal questions which is thus offered to them through the liberality of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, to whom, as secretaries of the society, I gladly take this opportunity of tendering our thanks.

POINTS PRACTISING AS ADVOCATES IN THE SUPREME COURT.—I read the letter of "A Liverpool Solicitor" in the LAW TIMES of the 6th inst., and I also read a letter signed "Charles B., A.S.A.E." in the LAW TIMES of the 13th inst. I believe that a very large proportion of your readers who are practising solicitors, have read these letters and thought over the little matter related by "A Liverpool Solicitor," will be with me in the opinion that, taking into consideration all the facts as stated by Mr. C. Connor, "A Liverpool Solicitor" has now some ground for complaint. Mr. C. Connor states that his purpose of correcting statements of facts, which he had confined himself to this object there the matter would have ended. Mr. C. Connor, in his letter, states that Mr. R. Montague Preston, of Chester, is the solicitor for the North-Western Railway Company, and that it was expected that he would have been present at the trial, but for some reason this gentleman did not attend, and the learned judge permitted Mr. Clerrand (Mr. Preston's managing clerk) to proceed in his principal's absence; and that for the plaintiff he (Mr. C. Connor) had instructed Mr. William Lowe, solicitor, "who after having well gone into the case," was compelled to leave the court. Mr. C. Connor does not seem to be aware that Mr. Preston practises at Liverpool as well as at Chester, and also that it was owing only to the extremely exceptional circumstances of this case, that his Honour, with great courtesy and consideration towards all parties, permitted the case to be conducted by non-professional gentlemen. Mr. C. Connor goes on to remark, "I flatter myself I am as well qualified as any solicitor for such a position," that is to say, he believes himself to be able to conduct a case or proceed with a case already commenced as well as a duly certificated lawyer. With reference to this very extraordinary remark, Mr. C. Connor would do well to consider, first, has he studied? and if so, is he the master of the principal legal text books in the law of evidence? Secondly, in his opinion, can a solicitor undertake and properly carry out the work of a certificated accountant, or can he attend a patient and prescribe the proper medicines to be administered as well as a medical gentleman? and, thirdly, the provisions of the statutes known as the Attorneys and Solicitors' Acts, and the Stamp Acts. Mr. C. Connor altogether fails to give weight to his observations by referring to "A Liverpool Solicitor," in the concluding sentences of his letter as "some unknown solicitor," for the use of such a meaningless and uncalled for expression can but lead many members of the solicitor profession to believe that, however influential he (Mr. C. Connor) may be as an accountant, his transactions with their profession have given him little or no opportunity of obtaining an insight into the working of quiet but high class practices.

WANT OF UNIFORM PRACTICE IN THE COMMON LAW OFFICES.—Referring to the paragraph on p. 185 of your issue of 13th inst., as to the want of uniformity prevailing in the common law offices, I may remind you that the payment of fees upon memoranda of appearance is regulated by the Order of 22nd April 1876, "as to fees and percentages," whereby the fee payable is to be denoted by an impressed stamp, and where the appearance of several defendants is entered by one memorandum, the fees for all persons beyond the first are to be paid by impressed or adhesive stamp. The practice of the Common Pleas Division is to accept either an impressed or adhesive stamp upon a memorandum of appearance entered for one defendant, but where the latter plan is adopted attention is drawn to the above rule upon the subject, which expressly directs payment of the fee by impressed stamp. As regards certificates of non-appearance, the practice of giving such certificates has never prevailed in the Common Pleas Division; no difficulty has arisen in that division by employing a modification of the "search" system which prevailed previously to the passing of the Judicature Acts, so that the giving of such certificates would appear to be an unnecessary addition to the already too numerous forms prescribed by the rules—as where it is absolutely necessary to prove the fact of appearance or non-appearance, a short paragraph added to an affidavit is all that need be required. An uniformity of practice would be as great a boon to the officers of the various courts as it would be to the Profession.

C. P.

[We are glad to publish the letter, and we hope it may lead to some action with a view to uniformity of practice, which at present does not exist in the common law divisions.—[ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

COSTS UNDER THE JUDICATURE ACT.—Permit me to point out a fact which appears to be lost sight of in your leading article on the case of Baker v. Oaks (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671), which appeared in your issue of the 6th Jan. In that case it seems to have been assumed that under the provisions of Order LV. of the rules of the Supreme Court, costs follow the event in all cases tried by a jury, unless the judge at the trial orders otherwise. I submit this is not so. Order LV. provides that, "subject to the provisions of the Act," costs are to be in the discretion of the court; then follows the proviso as to costs in actions tried by jury. Now if we turn to sect. 67 of the Judicature Act 1873, we find that the provision of sect. 5 of the County Courts Act 1867, are to apply to all actions in the High Court of Justice, consequently the effect of this enactment is to deprive a plaintiff of costs where he recovers no more than £20 in contract, unless the judge certifies that there was sufficient reason for proceeding in the High Court. In such a case, then, the defendant need take no steps to deprive the plaintiff of costs; the statute itself prevents any being recovered. Now the action of Baker v. Oaks was brought on the common money counts to recover three separate sums of £61, £60, and £8. The £61 was paid into court by the defendant, and as to the residue he pleaded never indebted. The claim for £60 failed altogether, but the plaintiff recovered a verdict for £4 6s., being part of the sum of £8. As it has already been held that where a plaintiff combines two separate and distinct claims in the same action, they may, for the purposes of costs, be treated as two actions (Smith v. Hornor, 3 C. B., N. S., 829; and Blackmore v. Higgs, 15 C. B., N. S., 790). I think it was arguable that the claim of £8 ought to be treated as a separate action for that amount, and if this view had been adopted the plaintiff would have got no costs without a judge's certificate. This point does not appear to have been brought before the court at all. The plaintiff now admits the verdict should have been for £1 19s. only, and he would perhaps contend that he was bound to go to trial in order to recover that amount; but in answer to this the defendant might fairly urge that he went into court because the plaintiff was making an unfounded claim in respect of the £60. The court very properly held that any application to vary the incidence of costs should, in the terms of Order LV., be made at the trial; but in the particular case under discussion, it appears to me that the defendant might have successfully opposed the plaintiff's claim for costs incurred after the payment into court, on the ground that sect. 67 of the Act of 1873 precluded him from recovering them. At all events, I think this was worth trying.

M. H. P.

[We have received another letter signed "Costs," which shows a lamentable ignorance of the subject. "Costs" will find where his error lies by reading the case of Parr v. Lilliecrapp (1 H. C. 615), the decision in which is equally applicable to the law as it at present stands.—ED. L. T.]

LAY IMPROPRIATORS AND CHANCERS.—All text writers appear to agree that lay improprators are bound to repair the chancels of the churches of the parishes from whence they take their tithes. In an appeal for a contribution towards raising the sum of £1000 to endow the Flitcham (Norfolk) living, the vicar states that no patron ever gave the living anything except the site of the vicarage house and £20 a year. And it appears that the tithes which he takes are about £800 a year, and that the chancel is in ruins. The appeal also states that the archdeacon reports the church to be in the worst condition of any in the archdeaconry, that the bishop cannot be unaware of the condition of its chancel. The farmers are nearly if not quite all of them tenants of the Earl of Leicester (the lay improprator), so that they cannot take action in the matter. What is the best course for the vicar to take to compel the lay improprator to do his duty by repairing this chancel.

A. H. A.

SUCCESSION DUTY.—Although queries and answers on this important branch appear from time to time in your paper, I do not remember seeing an answer to the following case, which is common enough: A will directs a sale and conversion of real and personal estate, and a division immediately afterwards amongst a number of objects. Can the purchaser insist on the discharges for succession duty being produced, and, if not, will the land remain liable in the purchaser's hands for such duties? It must be borne in mind that these duties are a charge on the land. The conditions of sale generally prevent any inquiries. But when a reply is given it generally is that the vendors, being trustees, exercising a power or trust for sale, the purchaser has no need to trouble himself. This, however, hardly seems an answer. The case of Dugdale v. Meadows (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 212; and confirmed on appeal) bears on the subject, but not directly, and that case was decided on special grounds. I gather that where, in a settlement or will, there is a trust for sale, with directions for re-investment or powers of sale and exchange and the like, the liability for succession duty attaches to the land freshly acquired in place of the land sold. In such case, of course, the purchaser has a good title, but the case I have put does not seem within it. (See sects. 20—42 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 71.) I should be very glad to hear some of your correspondents on this subject.

REFORM OF MAGISTRATES' COURTS.

LAST Monday evening (15th inst.) Mr. Serjeant Cox read an important paper, entitled "Amendment of the Procedure in Magistrates' Courts," at a meeting of the above society which was held at its rooms, 1, Adam-street, Adelphi. Mr. Charles Hopwood, Q.C., M.P., took the chair, and there were a number of magistrates present, including Sir John Heron Maxwell and Mr. D'Eyncourt.

Mr. Serjeant Cox said that the procedure in the Superior Courts had been amended, if not by the abbreviation anticipated, by approximating the language of the forms to the understanding of those to whom it was addressed. The County Courts had set a good example. They also were popular courts, where, as in the magistrates' courts, the suitors for the most part appeared in person to conduct their own cases, consequently there were special reasons why the procedure should be as simple and intelligible as possible. The County Courts had done this, and had found no difficulty in the working of it. Nevertheless, the magistrates' courts, although having many more suitors, and a much greater proportion of them appearing in person without professional aid than in the County Courts, were permitted to continue the old cumbersome procedure and the same tedious and unintelligible forms as before. Some time ago communications passed between the late Mr. Oke and himself, upon this subject. The former entered into the question with characteristic zeal, and he (the learned serjeant) assisted him in preparing a scheme of magistrates' courts reform, and was to have brought it before the House of Commons. The idea was to simplify procedure, and materially abbreviate all the forms. The loss of the learned serjeant's seat, however, prevented this second reform from taking the first step in the session. The Bill perished at its birth and nothing had been heard of it since. It would be remembered that, a short time ago, the present able and energetic Home Secretary (Mr. Cross) publicly commented upon the committals from magistrates' courts, asserting that many more persons were in prison than ought to be there. He attributed this to imperfections in the law, or rather in the processes by which the law was enforced, and hinted that he purposed to grapple with the question of penalties and their enforcement, with a view to limit the number of imprisonments. As Mr. Cross was a man who performed his promise, and who was not afraid to legislate boldly when satisfied that a reform was needed, he (the learned serjeant) had no doubt that Mr. Cross would, before long, if not in the coming session, act upon this resolution. Should he do so, it was most desirable that advantage should be taken of the subject being mooted to reform the whole procedure of magistrates' courts. He would have no serious opposition to encounter, for the members of Parliament were themselves magistrates, and none knew better than they the defects of the present procedure and the inconveniences that resulted from them as much to the magistrate as to the suitor. It was with the hope that this part of the question might attract the attention of Mr. Cross that the subject was before the society. At present a summons was presumed to be issued only after a formal information taken on oath before a magistrate, thus making a quasi-judicial business of that which ought to be, as in every other court it was, a purely formal process. The origin of this ceremony, doubtless, was to enable the magistrate to determine, before a case was brought before him formally, if it was one over which he had jurisdiction. In practice this rule was now rarely observed. It would be physically impossible, for a magistrate could not always be found, and it would be hard if an complainant were compelled to travel many miles, as often he would, to make his complaint in person. The law had only been rendered tolerable by what was really a breach in it. Save in certain cases, where an information on oath was expressly required by some statute, the summons was issued by the clerk without a sworn information, leaving that part of the ceremony to be performed after the event, if the need should arise. In pursuance of the same scheme, the summons was required to be signed by the magistrate, on the assumption that he had already heard the complaint on the information, and determined it to be prima facie a valid one. But although professing to be issued on this information, it was in fact not only issued without the sworn information, but where the court sat at long intervals, or the magistrate, as in many country places, lived far away, the summons was signed in blank and no inconvenience or injustice had ever yet resulted from the arrangement which, though extremely convenient to all parties concerned, was not regular.

What should be the change in this initial process? Assimilate the Magistrates' Court to the County Court. Let there be a short plaint upon which (unless he saw in it a charge obviously out of the jurisdiction) the magistrates' clerk should issue the summons under the seal of the court, the party requiring it paying the nominal fee of a shilling for the summons, with a charge of mileage for service, unless the service be undertaken by the complainant. The plaint should state the charge very briefly. It should be signed by the complainant, and where the charge is made under the provisions of some statute, it should state the statute, for, as it was, defendants were often very much perplexed to discover what the charge was they were required to answer. The plaint might run thus:

"A. B., of Pinner, in the county of Middlesex, grocer, complains of C. D., of _____, that on the 1st of January, 1877, at Pinner aforesaid, he did assault the said A. B. (or that he was upon the land of A. B., of _____, in pursuit of game), &c."

The summons should with equal brevity run thus:

"To C. D., _____—You are summoned to appear before the justices of the peace at the petty sessions of the Gore division of the county of Middlesex, at Edgware, on Wednesday, the _____ day of _____ next, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, to answer the complaint of A. B., of Pinner, in the said county, grocer, that you did assault him on, &c. (copying the plaint)."

"E. P., Clerk to the Justices of the said division."

"TAKE NOTICE.—If you fail to appear, the justices will proceed to hear and determine the charge against you, or will issue a warrant for your apprehension, at their pleasure."

There were few lawyers not familiar with the wonderful documents that now were supposed to convey to defendants in many cases the information that they were charged with an offence that might be stated in two lines at the utmost. A foolscap page, closely printed, was only a modest specimen of this. Some extended to nearly two pages. Criticising their contents, however, the origin of this wonderful wordiness was apparent. It seemed to have been a fixed notion with their legal ancestors that every document should be complete in itself, and show the whole history of the case, and by what authority it was dealt with, and how disposed of, so that the learned eye could not find a flaw in it. Hence the tediousness of all these processes. The judges sanctioned the practice of picking holes, not in the substance of them only, but in the most trifling matters of form, so the forms used in the courts grew to be the formidable creations they were now found. They had been for the most part reformed elsewhere, but they were still permitted to cumber magistrates' courts in the shape that was once a necessity, but now had become an absurdity.

The adoption of this simple process of a plaint, briefly stating the charge, and a summons as briefly copying the plaint, would at once sweep away some hundreds of printed forms which magistrates' clerks were now obliged to keep, which were addressed to the litigants in Magistrates' Courts, which they were presumed to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest, but of which they did not and could not understand a single sentence. The same reduction to a short, plain statement of the matter sub judice should be adopted in all documents employed in these courts, and which were all equally capable of abbreviation. The procedure at the hearing was upon the whole satisfactory, but two or three amendments might be introduced with advantage:—

1. The court should be empowered to consolidate plaints arising out of the same subject matter, not only between the same parties but between different parties. For instance, in charges of assault there were frequently cross summonses between the same parties, or several summonses against other parties, each desirous to give his account of the affair and to prevent his adversary from telling his own story. It was one transaction—one quarrel—one row—and it was a waste of time, and a source of confusion and perplexity to the magistrate, and often the cause of substantial injustice to some of the parties, to be compelled to treat each charge as a distinct offence. Justice might be better done by having the whole story told at once, and the relative merits of the various charges determined together. It might well be left to the court to say what was a proper matter for such a consolidation. But this would compel another much demanded amendment. The Evidence Act should be extended to all offences not indictable. It was an unfortunate decision by which that Act was held not to extend to summary convictions, on the unsatisfactory ground that all cases punished by a penalty are quasi criminal. He doubted if this was the intention of Parliament; certainly it was not that of the author of the statute, which was originally suggested by the learned serjeant, and drawn with his assistance. The exception was certainly contemplated to apply to offences really criminal and not merely quasi criminal. The result was that magistrates' courts witnessed a vast number of cases being criminal only in form, are merely quasi criminal, but which were deprived of the law had provided for the trial of such cases. The learned serjeant proceeded to read instances showing the anomalies of the procedure and the need for its amendment. He repeated that the reform required was to limit the exception of the Evidence Act to indictable offences. He was, of course, aware that influential persons inclined to removal of the exception altogether, and make the defendants in criminal cases admissible as witnesses for themselves. For his own part, he dissented from this view for reasons too numerous to be set out now. But he had no hesitation in advocating all cases only quasi-criminal, which were tried by summary conviction. It might be that the adoption of such an amendment in the procedure of magistrates would give a fair trial experiment, and might be recommended on ground alone. The conviction should be in the shortest form, merely reciting the plaint as heard on such a day, and that such judgment. A general power of amendment in proceedings should be given to the magistrates. Power should also be given to him to indict for perjury in any case, the penalty to be paid as were the costs of other proceedings in all cases, if the defendant did not appear for service of the summons, the court should be empowered to hear and determine the charge against the defendant afterwards appeared and good cause for his absence, the magistrate should be empowered to re-hear the case on such a day as he might impose. In short, the provisions of the recent Employers and Workmen's Act should be extended to all cases. The court should be empowered to grant a new hearing upon the application of the defendant. Instead of the indecisive designation of quasi-criminal cases, some more definite title should be given to them, by which all the proceedings should be described. Each court should have a seal. The clerk should be paid by salary, by fees, the table of fees and costs being fixed by the Home Office. These, together with fines, should be paid to a common fund from which the salaries and other expenses of the court should be defrayed. The magistrate should be empowered to order payment of expenses incurred by prosecutors or witnesses in the discovery of offences, or pursuit of offenders, as also to give rewards of special services. Superior Courts were now permitted to order payment of costs in cases of felony. The present system of fees in magistrates' courts was very unsatisfactory. In practice the amount of the costs was measured by the costs. The magistrate was required to know what the costs were, but he could not determine what the penalty should be because the costs were of uncertain amount, and he must consider them as being the punishment. The expenses of witnesses were, of course, quite independent of court fees, and were incapable of regulation. With regard to the enforcement of payment of costs, which had been mooted by Mr. Cross as a defect in the law calling for amendment, the Secretary had objected to a too frequent imprisonment. Hundreds of persons were in gaol who ought not to be there. He suggested no specific plan by which the costs could be obtained by other means. He admitted that if a substitute for imprisonment were found it ought to be provided. If it were to be any punishment at all there was to be between a fine and imprisonment. But a fine or penalty unless it be paid. Not to be paid was to give practical impunity to offenders, and would speedily reduce the condition of anarchy. How then might the costs be made to pay the penalty he had in mind? Some little improvement might be made by obliging the magistrates to order payment of costs, by giving them a claim upon the defendant for wages due, and by power to levy an arrest in distress. But all of these would be remedies as against the great majority of defendants. For the most part they were loafers, lodgers, possessing nothing but their own strength, and they were unable to pay in pure and they were obliged to pay in person, the law would be a letter and justice a mockery. One step had occurred to him towards the remedy. Sureties might be allowed to be taken in lieu of payment of penalties, and in some cases proved poverty sureties might be taken in lieu of payment of costs, with a distinct provision that, in cases of failure to pay, the imprisonment should be doubled. In conclusion he said he thought the present law admitting to bail prisoners committed for trial might be considerably extended with great advantage. During the twelve years he had sided at the Middlesex Sessions, there had been upwards of 20,000 prisoners, of whom at least 2000 had been on bail. Now, not one of these had been persons of property, charged with grave offences. But during the whole time he could not recall half a dozen instances by the accused by forfeiture of bail. It is also a remarkable fact that all of those who appear were persons of the better class. I do not remember a single instance of forfeiture by a person belonging to the class that I had ninety-nine in a hundred of those committed for trial. Other minor amendments in the case of magistrates' courts would, doubtless, do themselves to the framers of a measure that object. He threw out these suggestions as to how much reform was needed, and how easily to be introduced were the remedies to be applied. (Cheers.)

Marshall, in opening the discussion which followed, said that in certain cases magistrates have the power of assessing damages to who had been assaulted. That was something the only way that compensation could be made for the poorer man. He advocated the giving of those who were accused in criminal

Arthur Ryland, a Birmingham magistrate, said, with respect to applications for summons, he believed the best course would be that of applying for a summons should, in cases of wrong, have the plaintiff on application to a magistrate's clerk. He recommended his brother magistrates not to immediately grant summonses to those who demanded them, for it often happened that after a petty quarrel, in the heat of the parties applied for them, and regretted so after their temper was cooled. He felt the necessity of examining both the plaintiff and the defendant in criminal cases.

A. H. Safford, magistrates' clerk, South Police Court, considered that the simplification of the procedure of magistrates' courts was very necessary. Where cases were under consideration he would suggest that clerks should be empowered to decide them; they should also be empowered to grant summonses subject to appeal to the magistrate if they were dissatisfied with the clerk's decision. He considered magistrates should have the power to remit altogether. People rushed into litigation because they could obtain a summons for a sum as low as 2s. For the purpose of saving magistrates a great amount of trouble the clerk should be empowered to take such things as these courts which was utterly useless.

D'Eyncourt, police magistrate, said that an intelligible complaint was made the better. A clerk being allowed to grant a summons, as a rule, he had not the experience of circuit business as a magistrate had, in which the influence and weight of the rate must be very much greater than that of a clerk, and his position would stop a great number of summonses. Upon the whole he (Mr. D'Eyncourt) thought it would be a great disadvantage to refer a summons to a magistrates'

John Heron Maxwell, J.P., thought that amendment of the law relating to bail for arrest was requisite.

James Gresham, Mansion House clerk, said as regarded bail, the delinquents who answer to their bail were to be found the rich and not among the poor. He also alluded to the great difficulty in procuring bail.

Martin thought bail was of very little use on account of the difficulty of enforcing it.

Hidney Thomas contended that defendants should be allowed to ask questions upon those points which would elucidate the main points of the case.

George Howell considered that the present law was fast making criminals, and that magistrates' courts might be made into civil courts.

J. H. Ryalls, secretary, in moving that the case be referred to the committee for the revision of the Crime Section, said that Lord Russell, in his recent address at Brighton, alluded to the fact that during past years there had been a very great increase in the number of commitments from police courts upon summary convictions, his Lordship going so far as to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject. As regarded the jurisdiction of clerks to magistrates, there was need of very great caution. In cases of bail was required every facility should be given or it being taken.

A. H. Safford seconded the motion of Mr. Broadhurst expressed his opinion that bail should be extended in every direction when it could be given with safety. For himself, he should wish to see reform to the fountain head of justice.

Hopwood, Q.C., M.P., said that several of the learned serjeant's excellent suggestions had been adopted by the members of Parliament who assisted him when the matter affecting reforms in the magistrates' courts was before the House. In pursuance of a special request he

(Mr. Hopwood) had drawn up a Bill on the subject, which he intended to submit to Parliament next session. The grievances complained of were of the gravest character, and affected a large portion of the community. He remarked on the distrust which he was bound to say, in a considerable measure was well founded, as to the unfairness and harshness displayed by some magistrates in cases of summary jurisdiction in criminal matters. When he brought the subject of the reform of magistrates' courts before the House of Commons, he was asked whether he intended to arraign the whole class; but such was not his purpose. No doubt a large body of them would be glad to learn, and to be warned that there was a distrustful feeling of them abroad. The system of appointing magistrates enabled some very inefficient, incompetent, and foolish persons to be put in high places. The present state of the law almost forced magistrates to send persons to gaol, they having no other alternative. The condition of things had produced much dissatisfaction, which only too truly existed. The question of allowing the accused to become his own witness was making very great progress. The opponents of this measure had said that this would be an incentive for a man to lie, but this he denied. The main point upon which they should all feel indebted to the learned serjeant for his paper was, as to the question of sureties, he having stated the principle and declared himself in favour of it. Mr. Cross had admitted that a number of people went to gaol who ought never to have been sent there, and that out of every 120,000 convictions yearly, 30,000 ought never to have been sent to gaol, and yet no bill upon the subject had yet been contemplated by the Government. His (the speaker's) idea was that no man should be allowed to send another to gaol without the convicted person having the right of appeal. In respect to justices' clerks, they were still paid by fees, which was a great evil. Nearly twenty years ago an Act of Parliament was passed allowing all the central authorities to make arrangements by which clerks should be paid by salaries instead of by fees. Mr. Cross promised that this would be made compulsory upon all the counties, but he was not aware whether the Home Office had taken any further steps in the matter. In conclusion Mr. Hopwood trusted that, considering the vast number of persons who were sent to gaol who ought not to be there, and having regard to the portentous amount of human suffering thereby caused, it was necessary that the most speedy remedy should be applied. (Applause.)

It was then resolved that the whole subject should be referred to the committee of the Revision of Crime section, and the usual compliments to the reader of the paper and the chairman having been passed, the proceedings terminated.

65. ARRANGING DEBTOR.—I shall feel obliged if any of your correspondents can inform me what is the exact status of an arranging debtor, under the following circumstances: A debtor, unable to pay his creditors, files a petition for liquidation, under sect. 125 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and a resolution is come to by the creditors that his affairs shall be liquidated by arrangement; the trustee takes possession of the whole estate of the debtor; no resolution is come to as regards the discharge of the debtor; three years elapse, and the trustee declares no dividend—in fact, takes no steps whatsoever to realise the estate. What is the position of the debtor with regard to after-acquired property, and in what better position would he be if he obtained his discharge? What disabilities does he labour under by reason of not having obtained his discharge?

66. WILL—SHARES.—A. is seized of a freehold messuage, and in 1836 mortgages the same to B. for a term of 1000 years, with a power of sale. A. dies in 1859, leaving the mortgage debt still unpaid, and, by his will, gives all his property to his wife for life, and then to be equally divided among all his children equally. The widow died last September. A., at the time of his death, leaves three sons and two daughters, both of whom are married; but one of the daughters, say C., dies in 1871 intestate, leaving her husband, a daughter (now aged 24), and a son (now aged 19), all now living. In the meantime the mortgage debt and arrears of interest is still outstanding, and in the year 1870 it is transferred to one of the sons, say D. All the family are desirous of selling and paying off the mortgage debt, and dividing the balance. Can C.'s share be conveyed, and if so by whom; and does C.'s husband become a tenant by the courtesy of England? I think not, because her interest did not fall into possession till long after her death. If any of your correspondents will oblige with opinion.—C. E. L.

67. STAMP DUTY.—The members of a family re-settle their father's estate as left by his will, and under the arrangement portions of the estate in which they have a reversionary interest are paid to each member. Is the deed effecting this arrangement subject to stamp duty? A. D.

68. STATUTE OF FRAUDS.—In Goss v. Lord Nugent (5 B. & Ad., 58), the court intimated an opinion that "a written contract within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, might be wholly waived and abandoned by a subsequent oral agreement. In the 9th edition of Chitty's Contracts, page 107, I find 'Whether a contract within the Statute of Frauds can be wholly waived and abandoned, before breach, by a subsequent agreement not in writing, appears to be veratio quæstio.' Can you tell me if there is any later authority, or refer me to any later cases on this subject? F. D. A.

69. LEGAL PROCEEDINGS—JOINT REMEDIES.—A tug-boat owner towed a vessel into a river. The captain refusing payment he obtained under a Local Commissioners Act an order in the police court on the captain for payment of the towage, but the captain sailed to sea ere the order could be executed on the ship. Does this order estop the tug-boat owner proceeding in the county court against the owner, or can the order be executed on the owner who lives in another part of the country? LEX.

70. VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—Vendor enters into a written contract with purchaser for the sale to him of a freehold estate, the purchase to be completed on a day certain. The purchaser is unable to complete to the day. There is no stipulation in the contract for payment of interest in case of non-completion. Can the vendor rescind the contract? C. B. A.

LEGAL NEWS.

ON Monday the personality of the late Chief Justice Whiteside was sworn under £35,000. It is stated that £20,000 goes to the widow.

AT the auditing of the accounts of the Keighley Board of Guardians, the auditor has surcharged a sum of £128 14s. 7d. on the guardians who signed the cheques, Messrs. Milner, Sedgwick, and Newbould. The sum was the costs which the Local Government Board had incurred in obtaining the mandamus against the guardians last spring.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.—Appeals from the inferior courts assigned to the Queen's Bench Division will be taken in that division on Wednesdays and Saturdays; those assigned to the Common Pleas Division will be taken in that division on Mondays and Thursdays; and those assigned to the Exchequer Division will be taken in that division on Tuesdays and Fridays.

THE stipendiary magistrate of South Shields recently ordered a merchant captain to be recalled, after the Board of Trade solicitors had given him a written notice that no charge would be preferred against him in respect to the stranding of his ship. Application was made to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ to prohibit the magistrate from proceeding further; but the judges held that to grant this would be to make a magistrate the mere tool of the Board of Trade, and the application was refused.

I EXPECT that the slaughter at the recent examinations for the Bar will be as great as it was last time. Some gentlemen from the sister isle were up, and in default of answers they endeavoured to beguile the monotony of the proceedings by pouring out less jokes into the examiner's ears. One of these budding Lord Chancellors, when asked whose duty it was to repair bridges, asked, "Where?" "Sir," indignantly said the examiner, "I am not here to answer your questions. You are here to answer mine." But, relenting somewhat, he demanded of the interrogator whence he came, and received the reply "Ireland." "Well, who mends bridges in Ireland, sir?" asked Mr. —. "Nobody, I should say," was the artless rejoinder. The examiner did not smile, and the gentleman from Ireland did not receive a mark for that answer.—Mayfair.

the Judges of Appeal find that their work grows rapidly, and the arrears will soon become formidable. We sincerely trust that the authorities will provide against a deadlock in the Court of Appeal, and not by procrastination afford further food for judicial criticism and professional complaint.

READERS of Austin's Jurisprudence are familiar with the long examination of the definition of a State contained in that treatise. The Master of the Rolls, in the case of Cadell v. Earle, which was decided on the 22nd inst., had a kindred question for his decision. A testator had in his will, which was dated in 1829, directed his executors to appropriate a sum of money for a certain object, and gave them power to invest it "in or upon any of the Government securities, or upon any of the stocks or funds of the Government of the United States of America, or of the Government of France, or of any foreign government." The court was called upon in an administration suit to say whether the trustees were justified in investing in bonds of the States of New York, Georgia, and Ohio. It was contended that the investment was ultra vires, inasmuch as the only governments expressly mentioned in the will were supreme governments, from which it must be inferred that by "any other foreign government," was meant none other than supreme governments, having the right of making war or peace. His Lordship did not agree with this contention, but on the other hand decided that the investments were made with authority. "It would be going too far," said His Lordship, "to say that the power of making peace and war was the criterion of government contemplated by the testator. The Kingdom of Bavaria is more subordinate to the German Empire than any State in America to the Federation of the United States; yet who would say that the Kingdom of Bavaria was not a foreign government within the meaning of the will?" From these remarks, it will be at once seen that the Master of the Rolls thought that the "foreign government" contemplated by the testator was not that which would be recognised as such in International Law, and in the intercourse of nations. According to his view, the words meant the government of any country not within the jurisdiction of this country. Since each of the States of the Union has a government of its own, they were clearly, according to this view, adopted, foreign governments within the meaning of the will. The case affords an example of a difficulty frequently experienced in courts of law, that of assigning to words of every day use their appropriate meaning.

THE point of practice raised before the Court of Appeal, on the 24th inst., in the case of De Bergue v. The Rosslare Harbour Commissioners, affects all appellants from the decision of a Judge sitting in the Common Law Division without a jury. The Chancery practice in such appeals is well known. The appeal, upon both fact and law, is direct to the Court of Appeal. When a litigant wishes to appeal upon the facts and law from the decision of a Judge sitting in a Common Law Division, one of two courses, it may be argued, are open to him. It may be said that he is at liberty to go direct to the Court of Appeal upon both facts and law, or that his proper course is, first of all, to apply in a divisional court for a new trial according to the usual course in the case of a trial with a jury. Lord Justice Mellish thought that the most convenient course would be as in Chancery. The Lord Chief Justice, however, upon looking to the rules, did not think that there could be imported into the Common Law Divisions the Chancery course of proceedings without express provision for the purpose. Hence it was agreed, and in this the members of the Court of Appeal appear to have been unanimous, that under the rules as they stand an application for a new trial must still be made in such a case to the Divisional Court, and that it is only open to a party to appeal directly to the Court of Appeal on the judgment as entered by the judge as his own opinion on the finding as to the facts, that is, to appeal upon the law. It is much to be regretted that the Court of Appeal was not able to come to another conclusion, for, as it was suggested by Lord Justice Mellish, it is often a matter of great difficulty on an appeal to distinguish what is matter of law and what matter of fact. Hence the greater convenience of having only one appeal. But there is another serious aspect to this decision, and that is that the necessity of this additional step in the appeal will cause a longer delay and more litigation than in the very same case in the Chancery Division. That this was not the intention of the Judicature Act may be safely conjectured. Indeed, in the celebrated case of Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, it was held that where a cause in the Probate Division has been heard before a judge without a jury, the evidence being given vis à voce, the parties may, if they please, apply for a rehearing under rule 60 of the Probate Court Orders of July 1862, or they may, without doing so, appeal from the decision of the judge on the facts, as well as on the law direct to the Court of Appeal. In that case it was argued that in order to obtain a new trial of a cause tried in a Common Law Division before a judge without a jury, an application must be made for the purpose to a divisional court. To this Lord Justice Mellish replied that "In the Court of Chancery there was always an appeal on the facts."

The Law and the Lawyers.

Anticipations generally expressed that the new Courts of Appeal would very soon find the work too much for them, have been justified. The numerous Bench which has been found necessary for the decision of the Folkestone Ritual case is proof of the expense of the suitors in Chancery and bankruptcy, and of the Chancery Division of the Court of Appeal being suspended. But even without any such distraction as the law. Now the same rules apply to all divisions of the High Court." And Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in delivering the judgment of the court said: "I think we have all now come to this conclusion, that it is optional with the parties if they think it would be advantageous that the judge should reconsider the evidence with a view to the decision of the facts, to apply to him for that purpose, but it is not obligatory on them to do so. They may, if they please, treat his decision on the facts as a final decree in the case and appeal from it at once." How are these expressions to be reconciled with the observations made in De Bergus v. The Rosslare Harbour Commissioners?

MANY points in the law of carriers have been lately under the consideration of our courts. One of the most recent cases came before the Common Pleas Division on Monday last (Smith v. Great Western Railway Company). This was a case stated by the County Court Judge at Kidderminster. The facts were simply these. The plaintiff was a passenger from Worcester to Kidderminster by the defendants' railway. On arriving at his destination by rail he gave his luggage to a porter to put in the omnibus expected there on the arrival of the train. No omnibus, however, was in waiting. The plaintiff noticed this, and pointed out the fact to the porter, who thereupon said, "I will take care of your luggage till the bus comes up, and will then put it in the bus to follow you." This was agreed to, and the plaintiff gave up his ticket and left the station. Before the omnibus was able to take the luggage a bag, part of the luggage, left in the charge of the porter, was lost. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the railway company to recover the value of the lost bag. The County Court Judge, at the trial, was of opinion that the porter had exceeded his ordinary duty as a porter, and that the plaintiff had no knowledge that he was so exceeding. He directed a verdict for the plaintiff accordingly. After argument in the Common Pleas the Court held that the plaintiff had so acted as to put an end to the duty of the defendants towards him in any point of view; and that although the railway company had held the luggage as carriers, their liability on that head ceased when the plaintiff assented to the porter taking care of the luggage for an indefinite time. By so doing he assented to a new contract, and made the porter his servant. Here two questions may be raised: First, was the original contract with the defendants at an end before the loss? Secondly, if so, was the porter acting within the apparent scope of his authority when he received the luggage and undertook to put it on the omnibus? Upon the first question both Courts appear to have agreed that the original contract was determined. They differed in their answer to the second query. The question of apparent authority, if raised at all in the Court above, was decided in favour of the defendants. Upon the evidence before us, which may or may not be complete, this seems no more than a natural consequence.

A QUESTION of practical importance in bankruptcy law was raised on the 19th inst. in the Common Pleas Division, in the case of Brown v. Breslawer. An action was brought at the Hereford Summer Assizes to recover money paid on a bail bond with respect to the collision of a ship with another vessel. The defence set up was that the defendant had compounded with his creditors, and that the plaintiff had been an assenting party to the composition. It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff had only been scheduled as A. B. & Co., whereas he had attended and proved as A. B.; A. B. and A. B. & Co. being the same. The plaintiff had come in under the composition and proved. He had also received instalments of the dividends. The plaintiff's claim in the action was for 586*l.*; he had proved for rather more than 1000*l.* The amount which the plaintiff now tried to recover appeared neither in the statement of the debtor, nor in the proof of the creditor. It was admitted that the amount had not been made the subject matter of any composition. Was the debt under the security barred? In determining this question reference was made to two well-known sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, namely, the 31st and 126th. The former section provides, with certain exceptions which do not affect the present case, that all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which a bankrupt is subject at the date of the order of adjudication, shall be debts provable in bankruptcy; and by rule 270 all debts provable under bankruptcy are provable in composition. The case was practically decided by Campbell v. Im Thurn (L. T. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 267). In that case, to an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover a debt, the defendants pleaded, as in Brown v. Breslawer, that the plaintiffs were parties to an agreement under the Bankruptcy Act 1869, whereby a composition was accepted. A trustee was appointed, and money equal to the composition was paid to him for distribution. The plaintiffs' debt was not inserted in the statement of debts, but they came in, made a claim, and agreed to take the composition. "It seems to me that there are two kinds of creditors," said Mr. Justice BARNES, "who may be bound by a composition under the sec 36th of the Bankruptcy Act 1869]; those who are bound because they have agreed to be and those who are bound though they have not agreed. . . . If the non-assentients are to be bound, conditions must be fulfilled; and amongst other it is provided that the provisions of a composition, &c., be binding on all the creditors whose names and addresses the amount of the debts due to whom are shown on the statement of the debtor. I read that provision as applicable only to the case of persons who have not agreed to be bound, and not to the case of creditors who agree to accept the composition. . . . It seems to me that the plaintiffs here cannot be said to be parties to an agreement for a composition of 5*s.* in the pound under the 36th section of the Act." Mr. Justice LINDLEY thought this construction of the section a true construction, and was of opinion, inasmuch as there were two classes of creditors, namely, assentient and non-assentient, the negative words in the section apply to the latter class. Judgment was given for the defendant. The court came to the same conclusion in Brown v. Breslawer. In that case was an entry of the name and address of the plaintiff but an inaccurate entry of the amount of the debt. COLERIDGE pointed out that in such a case, a creditor was without his remedy, for there were rules provided by which a mistake could be set right. Besides, it was contrary to the policy of the law to contend that a particular creditor knew that proceedings were going on, and that he, in claiming, might content himself with an imperfect proof, afterwards step in and claim in full for a contingent liability which he refused to have valued at the time. In the case Mr. Justice GROVE, "A composition would be an idle ceremony such creditor was, so to speak, to play his own game, and keep secret from his brother creditors debts which he reserved." This cannot be done under a composition any more than in bankruptcy. The effect of the above decisions is to be to make creditors careful not to content themselves with imperfect proofs in the hope that they may avail themselves of their reserved securities.

THE Judges are evidently not of one mind on the question of the Judges' notes on County Court appeals. We recently stated that the Common Pleas Division had intimated that the 5th section of the County Court Act of 1875 is imperative, and that the County Court must furnish a note, whether he was required at the trial to take one or not, and went so far as to say that the Judge took no note he must give the best he could in memory. This struck us as importing words into the Act inconsistent with words already there. We are now to see that this view has been taken by the Queen's Bench Division, in the case of Mawby v. Shillaker, on appeal from the County Court. As this is a matter of everyday practice, we append the Times' report of the discussion:

MR. GRAHAM moved, by way of appeal, on behalf of the plaintiff, but he had not at present the notes of the County Court Judge who tried the case. He would ask the court for a rule to compel the Judge to provide notes, and also to adjourn the case until the notes had been furnished. This was the last day for moving.

MELLOR, J.—Did you ask the judge to take a note of the questions you wished to raise?

MR. GRAHAM stated that he made the regular application for the judge's notes at the end of the case, who said he would provide him a copy; the next day, however, the registrar wrote to the solicitor that no question of law was raised at the trial, and that the plaintiff had not been asked to take notes. A correspondence ensued on the subject, and in the end, although the notes had not been positively furnished, they had never been furnished.

LUSH, J.—When did you ask the judge for the notes?

MR. GRAHAM said he asked for them when the judge had given his decision.

LUSH, J.—That was after the trial. What questions of law were raised?

The learned counsel then went into the facts of the case, and read to the Bench an affidavit filed in the cause, wherein the principal facts were set out.

MELLOR, J., said he could see no question of law in the case as stated by the learned counsel; and

LUSH, J., after perusing the affidavit, said he concurred that there was no question of law.

MR. GRAHAM said he was not at the trial himself, but that the plaintiff's counsel had asked the judge for his notes, who said he would give them.

MELLOR, J.—He should have requested the judge to take a note of his objection at the time he raised it, or at least that the judge should embrace the questions on which he wished to appeal.

Their LORDSHIPS refused the rule.

In our last week's issue we referred to one aspect of the case in Warner v. Murdock, which will be found reported in the Law Reports for the present week. Our remarks upon this important decision of the Court of Appeal were so brief that we thought an apology is necessary for a short examination of the decision. An action was brought praying that a policy of insurance had been effected upon the life of a testator might be declared null and be delivered up to be cancelled on the ground that the ained by misrepresentation; a cross action was brought to over the amount secured by the policy. The two actions were solidated, and the Master of the Rolls ordered that they should be tried before a special jury. An application was made to the Master of the Rolls that the action should be tried before himself, with a jury. His Lordship refused application, deciding, upon the authority of Vice-Chancellor HALL, in Clarke v. Cookson (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646), that a Judge of the Chancery Division cannot try a case with a jury. The Court of Appeal has affirmed this decision. provided by Order XXXVI., rule 1, that there shall be no local venue for the trial of any action, but when a plaintiff proposes to have the action elsewhere than in Middlesex, he shall in his statement of claim name the place where he proposes the action shall be tried, and that where no place of trial is named in the statement of claim, the place of trial shall, unless a judge otherwise orders, be the County of Middlesex. "It seems to me," said Lord Justice JAMES, "that by the same course is to be pursued in all the divisions of the Court. If the case is a country case it should be tried at assizes, if a London case it should be tried at the London sittings, if a Middlesex case at the Middlesex sittings. All actions for trial should be set down in one general list, but regard to the division in which they have been commenced, each action should be tried by that particular Judge to whom duty should be allotted of trying actions upon the day on which it comes on in its turn for trial." It was asked on behalf of appellants, if it is the law that all actions to whatever division they belong are to be tried in the above way, what right has the Probate Division to try questions of fact with a jury? We assume that the Probate Division lays claim to no such right. obvious that the continuance of the practice in that division since the Judicature Acts came into operation has been due as much to the fact that the full effect of the Acts in this particular has not been ascertained as to any considerations of convenience. things stand, there is no direct authority that the Probate Division may not continue the former practice of trying cases with a jury; but, if a suitor should enter a probate action (which is to be tried with a jury) in the general list of causes to be tried in Middlesex, London, or the country, as the case may be, Warner v. Lock goes a long way to show that the Probate Division has lately no control over the action, and that in fact any jurisdiction exercised by that court with respect to jury causes is entirely contrary to the intent of the Judicature Acts.

THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

Since the passing of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, very serious inconvenience oftentimes attended the administration of the criminal law by reason of there being no court to hear and determine difficult questions of law which might arise during the course of a trial. true that a practice formerly existed by which the presiding Judge of a court of oyer and terminer took, if necessary, the opinion of the jury upon the facts as proved at the trial, and afterwards stated a case for the consideration of the other Judges, and applied the law to the facts as found by the jury, but no means were given for the decisions arrived at, which were therefore of little value except as applied to a particular state of facts. Over, those who most required assistance and superintendence in their judicial work were unable to obtain it. The Court of Quarter Sessions had no power to state a case for the opinion of a superior tribunal; though in old times they occasionally dealt with one of the justices of assize before proceeding to judgment. This condition of affairs was at length remedied by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, entitled "An Act for the further improvement of the administration of the criminal law," which, reciting that it was expedient to provide a better mode of settling any difficult question of law which might arise in criminal trials in any court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery than then in use, enacted that "when any person shall have been convicted of any treason, felony, or misdemeanor, before any court of oyer and terminer, or gaol delivery, or court of quarter sessions, the Judge, or commissioner, or justice of the peace, or the person to whom the case shall have been tried, may, in his or their discretion, reserve any question of law which shall have arisen on the trial for the consideration of the justices of either bench and barons of the Exchequer, and thereupon shall have authority to respite the pronouncement of the judgment on such conviction, or postpone the judgment until such question shall have been considered and decided, as he or they may think fit; and in either case the court in discretion shall commit the person convicted to prison, or take a recognisance of bail, with one or two sufficient sureties, in such sum as the court shall think fit, conditional to appear at such time or times as the court shall direct and receive judgment, or to tender himself in execution, as the case may be."

which is the tribunal which has sat for well nigh thirty years, in accordance with the above statute, to hear and determine appeals in criminal cases. The numerous cases which have been brought under its cognisance abundantly prove that the interests of justice require that some such court should sit from time to time. The constitution and jurisdiction of the court are not, however, it must be confessed, at all satisfactory, and the present appears to us to be a proper time for pointing out the changes that might conveniently be made. Unfortunately, the Judicature Acts leave things exactly in statu quo. By the Act of 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, s. 41) no change is made in the court as it has hitherto existed; and by the Act of 1875 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 83, s. 19), the practice and procedure with respect to Crown Cases Reserved remains unaltered, "subject to any rules of court to be made under this Act." No such rules have been made; on the contrary it is expressly provided that the rules in force shall not affect the practice or procedure of, inter alia, "criminal proceedings." (Order 62.)

The first consideration is whether the court, as at present constituted, is the most suitable tribunal to hear Crown cases reserved, as they are called, at all, or whether, at all events, an appeal ought not to be allowed in certain cases, to the Supreme Court of Appeal. It is obviously inconvenient—and this is more especially the case now that the judicial staff has been numerically reduced, that five puisne judges should have to sit to form a court to determine points reserved, the majority of which are of a very trivial kind, and that the Nisi Prius sittings should have to be either entirely or partially suspended at a time when the arrears of causes are so heavy. Moreover, the practice of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, where any difference of opinion exists on the Bench, is to have the case reargued before all the judges. The evil of such a procedure has been remarkably illustrated during the last few months. The cases set down for argument last sittings included R. v. Tatlock and R. v. Keyn, in both of which a different opinion existed on the Bench, and both of which had to be reargued after an immense amount of time had been consumed to no purpose. What subsequently happened is notorious. Some fifteen of the puisne Judges sat together in solemn conclave for a week or more, during which time the business in the three Common Law Divisions and at Nisi Prius was necessarily almost at a standstill, and this just prior to the commencement of the summer circuits. A great portion of this time was taken up by discussions among the judges themselves—a circumstance hardly to be avoided in so large an assembly; indeed, when the Lord Chief Justice asked Mr. Benjamin what time he would take to reply, Sir George Bramwell, with considerable humour, replied that the question was one which might be more pertinently put to the Bench. Another still more serious evil which frequently entails great injustice is that the court, as at present constituted, sits but seldom, and a prisoner has sometimes been compelled to undergo a sentence which has afterwards been declared to have been illegally passed. According to the present practice the court only holds sittings on the second Saturday of each sittings, that is to say, the Saturday next but one following Nov. 2nd, Jan. 11th, and so on, and the cases reserved must be set down for argument beforehand. If the list is not exhausted at a single sitting, the court usually meets again on the following Saturday; but no fresh case can be heard unless entered in the list during the sittings. The consequences of such a state of things it is not very difficult to imagine. If a prisoner is convicted of a crime of however trifling a character, in which some point of law has by direction of the presiding Judge been reserved for argument, he may remain in gaol awaiting the decision of the court for a longer time than he would have been otherwise confined had no such point been reserved. Suppose, for instance, the condition of things we have just mentioned should arise at the summer quarter sessions or assizes, and it is obvious that the question of a man's guilt or innocence cannot finally be determined for four or even five months, because no court having jurisdiction will sit. The result is that justices and judges are sometimes deterred from reserving points of law by the consideration that the punishment which the accused will have to undergo, even if a decision should be in his favour, will be greater than the offence, if committed, deserves. It may be urged that under the express provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, bail may be taken pending such decision of the Superior Court. But a court is only empowered to take a recognisance of bail, "with one or two sufficient sureties and in such sum as the court shall think fit," and it often happens that the requirements of the statute cannot be fulfilled. Probably no better illustration can be furnished than the case of Reg. v. Berry (45 L. J. 123, M. C.), reserved by one of the learned and able chairmen who preside at the Worcestershire quarter sessions. The prisoner was charged and found guilty of stealing a watch on the 23rd Feb. 1876, but a point of law was reserved in his favour. An offer was made to take bail for the appearance of the prisoner, who had, however, no friends present, and was unable to obtain it. Consequently, he had to remain in prison till 21st May, when the conviction was quashed by the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved. So that this man, who was declared to have committed no legal offence, suffered a longer, if not so severe, term of imprisonment than he would in all probability have had to undergo if his guilt had not been called in question.

When public opinion is brought to bear on this question a remedy will be demanded and the grievance will cease to exist, just as the Winter Assize Act at once swept away an abuse which had been tolerated so long simply because it had escaped public attention. And in truth the remedy would be as simple as possible. Either transfer the jurisdiction to the Court of Appeal or to one of the Divisional Courts, and the mischief would at once be met. Such cases should, of course, have precedence, and as divisions of these courts sit either daily or at least frequently even during the circuits, no long delay could ensue in having any questions of law decided. If a divisional court of the High Court were entrusted with the hearing, such court might, if thought proper, consist of at least three members; and where a difference of opinion existed, the question might be sent for the determination of the Court of Appeal, in place of all the members of the High Court of Justice. The Court of Appeal would, however, be the preferable tribunal for hearing these cases in the first instance, because of the greater degree of weight attaching to its decisions; and questions of great importance might be argued before five or more of its members. Had this course been adopted in the Franconia case, the proceedings would have been shortened, and a vast amount of public time saved. It never can be necessary to summon all the judges to decide a point of criminal procedure in every instance where there has been a slight difference of opinion when the case was first argued. Such a course may have been excusable at a period of our history when the gallows was the punishment assigned for what are now considered comparatively trifling offences, and when on the issue raised the life of an accused person was at stake; but the time for any such precaution has now passed away.

In conclusion we wish to throw out for consideration whether an appeal, on a point of law, ought not to be given as of right in a criminal case, or at all events (which is really much the same thing) a right to have a point reserved. At present it is impossible to review a decision of a criminal court unless the presiding Judge consents to grant a case; and considering that those who preside over our criminal trials are not always versed in legal matters, it can scarcely be satisfactory that they should be permitted finally to determine pure points of law on which the liberty of the subject may depend.

POWERS, EXCLUSIVE AND NON-EXCLUSIVE.

In Re Veale's Trusts (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612), a testatrix, Mary Veale, after bequeathing to her daughter, Mary Elizabeth Veale, a life estate in a certain fund to which she was entitled, gave her a power to appoint such fund "to and amongst her (the testatrix's) other children or their issue in such parts, shares, and proportions, manner, and form as her said daughter should by deed or will direct and appoint; and in default of such direction and appointment, the said testatrix directed that the same should fall into and become part of her residuary estate and effects." The residuary legatee was one William Veale, and the donee of the power had exercised it by appointing the fund by will exclusively to one of her nieces, Emilia Mary Butler, and upon the hearing of the case before the Master of the Rolls, it was contended, on behalf of the petitioners, William Veale's representatives, that the appointment so made was an invalid exercise of the power, which, upon the proper construction of it, was non-exclusive, and that on failure of issue of Mary Elizabeth Veale, and in default of due appointment, the trust fund fell into and became part of the residuary estate and effects of Mary Veale, and therefore legally belonged to the petitioners, and not to Mrs. Butler, who was in possession of it at the time proceedings were taken.

The petitioner's counsel quoted several cases in support of their argument that the words "to and amongst" implied a non-exclusive power, notably those of Robinson v. Sykes (23 Beav. 40, see per Lord Romilly, M.R., 49), Garthwaite v. Robinson (2 Sim. 43, 48), and Stodworthy v. Sanicroft (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 223, 225). In Garthwaite v. Robinson, the Vice-Chancellor, in the course of his judgment, said "The question is whether the words of this power authorise an exclusive appointment? That question turns upon the grammatical construction of the sentence in the will in which the power is given. . . . The word 'amongst' implies that each of the objects should have a share." In Stodworthy v. Sanicroft also, a case, which, as observed by the petitioner's counsel, was "almost exactly on all fours" with the one sub judice, Sir Richard Kindersley decided that "the conclusion must be that an exclusive appointment was not authorised by the power. . . . The word 'amongst' showed clearly that there was a tenancy in common." Both these cases, however, were distinguished from Re Veale's Trusts by the learned Master of the Rolls, on what, with great deference, we venture to think somewhat flimsy grounds. No doubt, as he remarked, and as had been previously observed in Stodworthy v. Sanicroft, the decisions on the point are, to a certain extent, conflicting; but, after a careful study of the reports, it is imagined that no one could hesitate in the opinion that the great preponderance of modern authority, at least, is in favour of the construction contended for by the petitioners, and indeed, were authority altogether wanting, common sense logic and ordinary rules of grammar would seem clearly to indicate that to appoint "to and amongst" a class was non-exclusive and cannot appoint "amongst" one person. Apparently Sir G. was not of this opinion. He has, if we remember, upon previous occasions, expressed a strong dislike for subtle distinctions, and though he here for a moment takes them, the true ground of his decision was that he could not agree with what had been said in the cases to which he referred. Under these circumstances, "I must," he said, "adopt the rule laid down by the House of Lords in v. Hughes (8 H. of L. Cas. 571), that on questions of verbal interpretation one Judge is not bound to follow the decisions of another." After careful search through the reports of Jenkins v. Hughes, we have been unable to find a case like the so-called "rule," and we are strongly of opinion that the learned Judge must have been quoting from memory for once incorrectly, for it is obvious that if this "rule" had been obtained, and Judges were allowed at their own discretion to put a different interpretation on the same words, unless a corresponding difference in the context of the instrument containing them unmistakably warranted the different functions of the conveyancer and draughtsman would be reduced to a mere farce.

But although we think that the Master of the Rolls' decision in favour of Mrs. Butler was not sanctioned by authority, he had no good reason for refusing to follow it, it is very clear that in the case before him no substantial injustice may have been done. The donor of a power of appointment, though by deed or will words purporting to confer a non-exclusive power, would, in all probability, if questioned at the time as to his intention, state that in any event he would have intended the power being exercised exclusively. This, being in accordance with well-known rules of interpretation, would not be a judicial violation of the plain grammatical meaning of the words, or expression, and it is, therefore, satisfactory to know that the result is like the one in the case we have been discussing. It is likely to be of frequent occurrence in the future, inasmuch as the first section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 37 (an Act to amend the law as to appointments under powers not made before 1874), it was enacted "that no appointment which from the passing of this Act, shall be made in exercise of any power to appoint any property, real or personal, amongst several persons shall be invalid at law or in equity on the ground that any of such power has been altogether excluded, but every appointment shall be valid and effectual notwithstanding any one or more of the objects shall not thereby, or in default of appointment, take a share or shares of the property or of such power." The effect of this section is of course to put exclusive and non-exclusive powers upon the same footing. The history of the enactment containing it, and of the earlier enactments on the same subject (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 46), of which Lord St. Leonards was the sponsor, as given by Mr. F. W. M. in his concise work on Powers (Ch. 8, 294, 305), may be usefully consulted by the student in connection with Re Veale's Trusts.

AGENCY.—LIABILITY OF UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL QUALIFICATION OF HIS LIABILITY. (a)

THE extent of the liability of an undisclosed principal parties has been defined with tolerable clearness by a series of decisions, extending from the case of Railton v. Hodgson (576 N.) to that of Armstrong v. Stokes (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 596). The decisions may be distributed under four heads, according to the knowledge possessed by the third party at the time the contract was entered into as well as his conduct. Thus:—

- (1) The agent may give no information to the third party as to the existence of a principal.
- (2) The agent may simply inform the other contract party of the fact of his agency without disclosing the name of the principal.
- (3) The third party, knowing that he is dealing with an agent, and aware of the principal's name, may elect to deal with the agent alone.
- (4) The principal may be a foreigner resident abroad.

As to the first point it is stated by Lord Tenterden, in Thomson v. Davenport (9 B. & C. 78), "I take it to be a rule that if a person sells goods (supposing at the time the contract he is dealing with a principal), but afterwards it is discovered that the person with whom he has been dealing is not a principal in the transaction, but agent for a third person, he may, in the meantime, have debited the agent with the amount, and afterwards recover the amount from the real principal, subject, however, to this qualification, that the third person's accounts between the principal and the agent is not altered by the prejudice of the principal. The qualification here is ned a mere dictum until the decision of the Queen's Bench in Armstrong v. Stokes (ubi sup.) Before touching upon another case, it will be convenient to refer briefly to various dicta indicating an opinion on the part of judges that such a qualification of the general rule would be recognised.

Tailton v. Hodgson and Pule v. Hodgson (reported in a note in Edison v. Gandasqui, 4 Taunt. 576) which came before Lord, C.J., in 1804, that learned judge remarked: "If one had really paid S. L. and Co., it would have depended on circumstances whether he would be liable to pay for the over again; if it would have been unfair to have made him he would not have been so." The facts of these cases will be referred to when the subject of election by the vendor is considered. Mr. Justice Bayley (in Thomson v. Davenport, sup.) the qualification in the following terms: "The principal is not to be prejudiced by being made personally liable if the fact of the case is that he should not be personally liable. If the principal has paid the agent, or if the state of the accounts on the agent here and the principal would make it unjust for the seller to call on the principal, and the fact of payment or such a state of accounts, would be an answer to the demand brought by the seller where he had looked to the responsibility of the agent."

On the other hand, the expressions of Baron Parke in Heald v. Heath (10 Ex. 739, 745; 24 L. J. 76, 77, Ex.) seem to lead to a conclusion that that learned judge thought no such qualification existed. The decision itself cannot be accepted as authority with reference to the existence or non-existence of the qualification, inasmuch as the plea neither stated that the defendant was ignorant of the existence of the defendant till after he had paid the agent, nor affirms that the defendant admitted such to be the case. This was the opinion of the Queen's Bench in a subsequent case (Armstrong v. Stokes, L. Rep. 7 Q. B.

Ellenborough decided two cases in 1807 which have been referred to upon this question. In the one (Waring v. Favenek, 85) it was held that where goods are bought by a broker who does not disclose his principal until he, the broker, has become bankrupt, the principal cannot set off the price of the goods against a debt due to him from the broker. In the other (Kymer v. Percroft, 109) the plaintiff sold by public auction to the defendant, brokers, a quantity of coffee, to be paid for on delivery. The brokers acted for the defendant, whose name was not disclosed until the brokers became insolvent. The defendant having paid the brokers refused to pay the plaintiff. Lord Ellenborough directed the jury that "A person selling goods is not confined to the credit of a broker who buys them, but may resort to the principal on whose account they are bought; and he is no more bound by the state of accounts between the two than I should be bound to deliver goods to a man's servant pursuant to his order, without consideration of whether the servant was indebted to the master, or the master to the servant. If he lets the day of payment pass by, he may lead the principal into a supposition that he is solely on the broker; and if in that case the price of the goods has been paid to the broker on account of this deception, the principal shall be discharged. But here payment was made of the defendant on the several days it became due." This is thrown upon both those decisions by a consideration of the fact that in 1807, a London broker was bound by his bond to his principal if required to do so, and to abstain from acting on his own account. (See the form of the bond in Holt 81).

The question whether such a qualification existed was fully decided in 1872, in the case of Armstrong v. Stokes (L. Rep. 7 598), and the Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Lord, Mellor, and Lush, JJ., decided that a vendor who has credit to an agent, believing him to be the principal, cannot recover against the undisclosed principal, if the principal has in fact paid the agent at a time when the vendor still gave to the agent, and knew of no one else as principal. In the case of R. and Co., commission merchants, who sometimes dealt with principals as principals, bought a quantity of goods of the plaintiff, who had never been informed that he was acting as agent, but in the event of any dealing had always dealt with them. The contract to sell was made on the 15th of August, and payment was to be made on the 25th Aug. On the 24th Aug., R. and Co. asked for further time to pay. While the plaintiff was pressing this proposition, R. and Co. stopped payment on the agent, on which day the plaintiff discovered that R. and Co. were acting for the defendants. It was given in evidence that the defendants had paid R. and Co. for the shirtings, on the 15th Aug., in the ordinary course of their business, and no question of mala fides was cast on the transaction. The court assumed that there was authority to establish privity of contract between the defendants and those from whom R. and Co. had obtained the goods, the defendants were not liable on the grounds above stated. The court was apparently inclined to question the soundness in principle, but not the correctness of the law, of the rule which allows a vendor to have his action at all, against one to whom he never gave credit.

LAW LIBRARY.

A Treatise on the Law of Railways and Railway Companies. By Sir WILLIAM HODGES, Knight. 6th Edition. By JOHN M. LELY, Barrister-at-Law.—London: Henry Sweet.

THIS is a big book—unnecessarily big. One half of it consists of Statutes, one-fifth, we should imagine, of extracts from judgments. It is a modern text book of the oldest school, in which the author acts as a scribe, a diligent copyist of the ipsissima verba of men whose dictation he seems afraid to relinquish whenever it is possible to cling to it. It requires no particular acumen, no excessive keenness of vision, to see how the mass before us has been compiled. As page after page is turned over the patches of small type constantly appear, indicating that the author has imported bodily, either the whole or portions of judicial expositions or interpretations. We unhesitatingly denounce this as a vicious system. In the first place it is unfair, for a person purchasing a legal text book expects to be told by the author what the law is—not to be told what judges have said in laying down the law. The latter being absolutely unnecessary (certainly so far as practising lawyers are concerned, for if they want this knowledge they have the reports at hand to refer to), the purchaser is mulcted in so much hard cash in payment for an infliction which he resents. In the next place it is inartistic, and shows an utter want of capacity. Thirdly, it is demoralising and retrograde—instead of simplifying it is confusing: for system it substitutes chaos.

The present editor, we are sorry to see, has followed sedulously in the footsteps of his author. He adopts the same bad plan. He cannot refer to an important decision without giving the judges room to speak. This will appear from two illustrations: (1) as to the Carriers' Act and the felony of the carrier's servant; and (2) the unpunctuality question, decisions affecting which have been given in several cases, Ex. gr., (1) Vaughton's and McQueen's cases; and (2) Denton's and Le Blanche's cases. At p. 609 of the present work, is an extract from the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice in McQueen's case. To this is added a little useless extract from the judgment of Mr. Justice Quain—an extract which has the single but great merit of being a small one. Mr. Lely adds to these extracts the remark, "This decision is of great importance as laying down a distinct and intelligible rule on a point as to which there has been some doubt and uncertainty." But nowhere does he state this "distinct and intelligible rule"! He might have saved the necessity for quoting a single word, and have condensed the work by four pages if he had inserted the following lines:—

"Where goods above the value of £10 have been delivered to a carrier without any declaration, and have been lost, and it is alleged that they have been stolen by the carrier's servant, a prima facie case must be established before any inference can be drawn from the fact that the servants of the carrier are not called as witnesses.

"A prima facie case having been established, then if the carrier's servants are not called, the inference fairly arises as matter for the jury that the servants of the carrier stole the goods.

"The greater facility of access, on the part of the servants, is only one element for the consideration of the jury."

It is really remarkable that where the law can be so satisfactorily and so clearly stated, an editor should leave it unstated, preferring to leave it to be gathered by the unhappy practitioner from confusing references to wordy judgments.

We have to complain of the same thing with reference to our second category. Taking Le Blanche's case alone, why was it necessary to set out the judgments of the Lords Justices? There is something in each extract which might well have been omitted from the judgment and a fortiori from a text book. Lord Justice James appears to have been unusually verbose and, boiled down, his judgment comes to this: If a railway company is guilty of wilful delay, or reckless loitering, it fails to comply with its undertaking to use every effort to insure punctuality, and will be liable for breach of contract, notwithstanding a stipulation in the time bills that it will not be accountable for any loss, inconvenience, or injury which may arise from delay or detention. And, secondly, that if there has been such breach of contract, the passenger is not entitled to incur expense in the performance of that contract so as to charge the company, unless, as a reasonably prudent man he would incur it if he had to pay it out of his own pocket. Between four and five pages of this work are devoted to obscuring these very simple principles.

This great blot upon the work becomes more conspicuous when we come to the subjects treated of by the railway commissioners, many of whose judgments, containing elaborate statements of fact, are set out in extenso. We believe, however, and this is the single consolation, that there are persons who like to find in their text books plenty of dicta, who feel a kind of security where they are supplied with judicial tapestry in large quantities. To some minds a hazy uncertainty and a cloudy indefiniteness alone afford the conditions of comfortable existence. Such minds will be supremely happy with this sixth edition of Hodges on Railways; and if they make Russell on Crimes their companion volumes, they will have attained to regions to which professional inquiries will be slow to penetrate—a position unique and unassailable.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

ELSEWHERE we publish so much of the common law Nisi Prius cause-list for Westminster for the present Hilary sittings as remains undisposed of at the time of going to press, and which we hope will prove of use, especially to country solicitors, by comparing this list with the lists published in the daily newspapers. In doing so we have had occasion to unravel, or perhaps we should say to attempt to unravel, the curiosities and mysteries connected with this record of the business which the judges of the Common Law Divisions are called upon to dispose of. At the outset, let us say that although we publish a list of special jury causes separate from the common jury causes, the former are in fact to be found in the list posted up at the associate's office in Chancery-lane, mixed up with the common jury causes, and numbered in such list according to the place they occupy therein, such numbers being regulated by the time at which each action is set down for trial. We need not dwell on the serious inconvenience, if not the absurdity, of such an arrangement. While this admixture continues the advantage of giving a number to each action is considerably curtailed, for in ascertaining the time when a common jury cause is likely to come on, the numbers opposite the special jury causes must be left out of the calculation, and vice versa in the case of special jury causes. Again, we fail to see what use there can be in enumerating this cause list with a record of the name of the division to which each action is attached, for the chances are really usually two to one against a particular action being tried before a judge of the division out of which the writ of summons issued. So far, then, we insist on the necessity of a list of special jury causes separate and distinct from the common jury list, upon the regulation of the number set opposite the name of each action accordingly, and the omission of the reference to the division to which an action belongs. It has long ago been conceded that the present system of mixing up all the common law actions standing for trial in one single list is a far worse arrangement than that which existed before the Judicature Acts abolished the three common law courts. But perhaps the worst features of the present system have yet to be considered by us. It is no new thing to make a cause which has been standing for trial before a common jury, a special jury cause, for the mere purpose of delay, and this in itself is a decided evil, we feel strongly that when once a cause is set down for trial before a judge and common jury, an order for trial by a special jury should be necessary before such a change should be allowed. According to the present practice, however, an action which, we will say, stands 100 on the cause list, and for trial by a common jury, remains in its place on the list if subsequent notice is given by either party of intention to try before a special jury, and, say a dozen cases are so altered, including number 100, all of them standing on the list before a special jury cause numbered on the list, say 120, all these twelve cases come in before number 120, and would be in the ordinary course heard and determined before 120 is called on, and this, although number 120 in the general list may have been set down so as to come on early in the sitting. Surely it is only reasonable and fair that in such circumstances a cause so changed by order as we suggest, should be placed at the bottom of the list of special jury causes on the day when the change is effected. The present system operates the more unjustly, as a like evil is effected in another way, namely, by introducing cases into the cause list for trial on a particular day, by which the trial of other actions is frequently postponed. If further condemnation of the present system which prevails in the common law associate's office, is needed to secure some substantial alteration, it will be found in the following facts, for the correctness of which we can vouch. An action set down for trial before a common jury at Westminster last May, and which has not yet been reached, appeared about the middle of the Hilary sitting cause list. One day last week it was four out of the paper of special jury causes, having been made a special jury cause by the defendant, which resulted in its being thrown over the Long Vacation. Dispatch was of great importance to the plaintiff, a poor man, and delay answered the purpose of the defendant, a wealthy person. Three important witnesses from Wales being necessary for the proof of the plaintiff's case, they were telegraphed for on the evening when the cause was found to be only four out of the paper. There were at that time three special jury courts sitting at Westminster. The witnesses, men in humble circumstances, arrived in London the next day, but on the evening of that day it was discovered that only two special jury courts would sit at Westminster the next day, and, further, two common jury causes, which stood above the action in question on the list, had been set down for trial before special juries, and one other case had been introduced as set down for trial on the particular day. On the next succeeding day only one special jury sat at Westminster, and only three cases placed on the paper (we believe most of the judges were summoned to attend the Privy Council), one of which was a part-heard case, and another a cause set down for a particular day. Here, then, were witnesses three days in town at the expense of the plaintiff under circumstances which he could not in any way control, and a case set down for trial last May only reached eight months afterwards, such delay being due almost as much to the system of keeping the cause list, as from the block of business in the High Court. And, then, as if to dispel any lurking desire which this unhappy plaintiff may have ever again to indulge in the luxury of litigation in Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, the plaintiff is warned of the chances that exist against his leader being able to attend to his case, looking at the large number of courts sitting at Westminster, and the fact that the Q.C. in question has a large practice in each of them. Serjeants-at-law for many years enjoyed a monopoly in their exclusive right of audience in the now defunct Court of Common Pleas. They defended themselves against an attempt on the part of barristers to also practise in that court, and it needed a Royal warrant to overthrow a monopoly at once injurious to solicitors and of great pecuniary advantage to the serjeants themselves. Another Royal warrant is much needed, which should throw open the courts at Westminster to solicitors for the purpose of practising there as advocates, at all events in commonplace matters in which they are acting as solicitors, and which would in time have the effect of destroying the monopoly of the Bar, while the Bar would remain intact as a separate body of practitioners, entitled to appear as advocates instructed by solicitors; and further, given separate cause lists for each common law division, the tendency would then be to localise the leading advocates at the Bar to a great extent, as in the case of the several courts of the Chancery Division, where certain Queen's Counsel can always be relied on to attend to a cause set down for hearing before a particular Vice-Chancellor, or before the Master of the Rolls. In a pecuniary sense it answers the purpose of solicitors to institute proceedings in the High Court on behalf of suitors; but the interests of suitors at present still require that solicitors should resort as much as possible to local country tribunals, and the loud complaints of solicitors about the way in which business is got through at Westminster can hardly therefore be misunderstood by their clients or the public at large. No arrangement will be satisfactory to the public or to the Profession other than one which gives us a certain number of courts sitting de die in diem at Westminster, for fixed periods, the business of such separate courts to be published in a separate list at the commencement of every sittings. And, lastly, we have repeatedly seen the necessity for a separate court, before which all short and special, or pressing, applications should be made, thus preventing delay in the despatch of the ordinary business of the courts, which now frequently arises.

SERJEANTS' INN, Fleet-street, and Serjeants' Inn, Chancery-lane, are to be sold under the hammer. Since the time when serjeants-at-law were deprived by royal warrant of their exclusive right of audience in the old court of Common Pleas this distinct class of legal practitioners has gradually disappeared, and the Judicature Acts may be said to have given the coup de grace to their separate existence. The inns of the serjeants are therefore no longer of use to those few lawyers who are still entitled to wear the coif. We should have been glad if either the Incorporated Law Society or some other of the solicitors' organizations could have become the owners of the property in question, especially the Fleet-street Inn, which is large and commodious, and the chambers in which might be reserved exclusively for law students or lawyers. It is now more than likely—so we understand—that the Common Pleas offices will have to be moved before the new law courts are sufficiently advanced towards completion to admit of such offices being removed thither.

IN another column we publish a letter from Messrs. Smith, Fawdon, and Low, a firm of city solicitors, who complain of the wretched state of things at the common law judges' chambers. Our correspondents tell us nothing new. We have over and over again exposed the evils of the present system. It is intolerable and unbearable, and nine solicitors out of every ten practising in London will not on any account go to these chambers, which have justly been described as a bear garden, and probably an artful clerk seldom enters them without wishing that the time may soon come when he may be quit of the nuisance of having to attend such a place. Much of the work, however, done at these chambers is often, if not usually, much importance, and some of the judges' clerks are men of large and varied experience but can anything be imagined more preposterous than that such clerks should be morally, or to say, arable to have to leave their posts at death or resignation of a judge, to be immediately haphazard by the clerks of new judges, who are general for work requiring so much practice and experience. The present system should be reformed and in lieu thereof there should be a small number of common law chamber clerks, always chambers, and who should be quite independent of the judges, their appointment being of a permanent character as in the Chancery Chambers and as in the common law offices. It is evident that much of the raison d'être of the judges' clerks to dispose of the business at chambers has been done away with by the Judicature Acts, and if the judges' clerks are to be paid by the State instead of by their clients, yet that is no reason why it should be in a way injurious to the prompt and efficient patch of business. The present clerks should be offered the choice of remaining as unpaid officers unconnected with the judges, or, in future, solicitors should be appointed to the office of chief clerks, or registrars, as in the Chancery Division. All summonses for time should be made as regards all other business in the law chambers.

It is to be hoped that the controversy in our columns, and in those of the Times and other newspapers, on the subject of "commissioners" exhausted itself, for we fear that the subject good following therefrom is of a very limited character indeed. One thing is very certain, practice which has been so properly criticised, namely that by which solicitors recover the fees and commission charged by them, and others employed by solicitors on behalf of their clients, is certainly unprofessional. Consideration alone should be sufficient to any solicitor from pursuing such a practice. The Council of the Incorporated Law Society, been in correspondence with the Committee of the Estate Exchange, which is constituted of solicitors, and both representative bodies are in the opinion that such a practice as dividing commissions is to be condemned as entirely irregular, and not to be continued any way. The evil, however, exists largely, we hope it will diminish rather than increase.

As appears by an intimation in our advertisement columns, Major Anderson, of the Victoria (a solicitor), is taking steps to form one or two companies in connection with that corps composed exclusively of solicitors and clerks. We wish the movement every success. Applications are, we notice, to be made in instances to Captain Charles Ford, at this journal. There are already a large number of solicitors in the ranks of the Victoria the Artists' corps. There is really no reason there should not be a solicitors' regiment, we think Major Anderson should push in communication with the council of the Incorporated Law Society.

SOLICITORS have often complained of the power which certain judges have exercised, and which the superior courts long ago gave solicitors as officers of such courts, and have insisted that solicitors should govern themselves, as in the case of the subject, as in their case, to an appeal judges. The following has appeared in a newspaper:—"The Recorder of Dublin on Wednesday ordered a barrister under a writ insisting on further examining a witness the judge had directed to leave the table, the situation is in course of signature for a writ the Bar to consider whether he was justified in taking such a step." We know nothing of the merits of this case, but solicitors may learn a useful lesson from it, that of the value of combination and organization. Who ever has solicitors taking up the case of a brother solicitor when in some professional difficulty character? A little more esprit de corps among solicitors is greatly needed, and would be of great advantage in sustaining the character of the Profession.

IN the advertisement columns of our issue we published a notice emanating from the College, Bristol, calling for applications for office of Lecturer on Equity and Common Law. We are gratified at learning that the college are in this matter acting in concert with the Bristol Incorporated Law Society, and can well be more promising of good results.

Note.

Mr. Justice Lush has laid down the four following rules with respect to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, so far as it relates to the taxation of bills of costs:

1. To come within the statute the "fees, charges, or disbursements" must be for business done as an attorney. If the business was not done in that capacity, though the party charging for it was an attorney, his bill is not within the statute.
2. So long as an attorney's bill or any part of it remains unsettled, and no signed bill has been delivered, whatever payments might have been made, or whatever the statement of accounts may be between them, the client is entitled to have the whole bill delivered and taxed.
3. The bill, whether delivered voluntarily by the attorney or in obedience to the order of the court, should contain all the charges and demands which the attorney has or claims against the client for business of every kind done by him in his professional character for the client in the same right.
4. The bill must specify each item of charge; it will not suffice to put the costs of an action in gross, either as the amount agreed upon, or as the amount at which they have been taxed as between party and party; nor will it suffice to state only the items of the extra costs, the whole must be specified. ## ARTICLE 48.

SOLICITORS MAY MAKE AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO THEIR REMUNERATION.

The remuneration of solicitors may be fixed by agreement, but the amount payable under the agreement shall not be received by the solicitor until examined and allowed by a taxing officer of a court having power to enforce the agreement, who, if he does not think it fair and reasonable, may require the opinion of the court or a judge to be taken upon it:

Note 1.

"The meaning of sect. 4 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act 1870," said Jessel, M.R., in Re the Attorneys and Solicitors Act 1870 (1 L. Rep. 1 Ch. Div. 575), "is that a solicitor may make what agreement he likes with his client, but that he is not to receive any payment under it unless the taxing master considers it fair and reasonable; and if he does not consider it so, he may require the opinion of the court or judge to be taken on it."

Note 2.

The opinion of the court or a judge on the validity or fairness of such an agreement cannot be required under the above section before any money is payable under the agreement.

Re Attorneys and Solicitors Act 1870, supra.

No action or suit shall be brought or instituted upon any such agreement, but every question respecting the validity or effect of any such agreement may be examined and determined, and the agreement may be enforced or set aside without suit or action, on motion or petition of any person, or the representative of any person, a party to such agreement, or being or alleged to be liable to pay, or being or claiming to be entitled to be paid, the costs, fees, charges, or disbursements, in respect of which the agreement is made, by the court in which the business, or any part thereof, was done, or a judge thereof, or if the business was not done in any court, then where the amount payable under the agreement exceeds £50, by any superior court of law or equity, or a judge thereof, and where such amount does not exceed £50, by the judge of a county court which would have jurisdiction in an action upon the agreement.

Id. s. 8.

The court or judge is empowered to enforce fair and reasonable agreements, as well as to set aside, or order to be given up and cancelled, agreements that are not fair and reasonable. In the latter case the court or judge may direct the costs, fees, charges, and disbursements to be taxed as if no agreement had been made. The costs in either case are in the discretion of the court or judge.

Id. s. 9.

In case of the death or incapacity of the solicitor, an application to enforce the agreement may be made to any court which would have jurisdiction to enforce the agreement by any party there to or by the representatives of any such party, and the court shall thereupon have the same power to enforce or set aside such agreement, so far as the same may have been acted upon, as if such death or incapacity had not happened. If the agreement is deemed to be in all respects fair and reasonable, the court may order the amount due in respect of the part performance of the agreement to be ascertained by taxation:

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PRACTICE — PLEADING — REPLY — GENERAL TRAVERSE — NEW ASSIGNMENT — ORDER XXIV. RULE 2 — ORDER XIX., RULES 2, 18, 21. — A railway company were defendants to an action which raised the question whether or no a piece of land was included in an agreement, the plaintiffs asserting that it was not included and that the agreement conferred no title on the defendants to take it, and that the defendants had given no statutory notice of their intention to take it. The defendants pleaded that the piece of land was comprised in and shown on the plans deposited with their railway bill, of which the plaintiffs had full knowledge; that they were empowered to take compulsorily the piece of land and to enter upon it for the purposes of the agreement, and denied that the agreement conferred no title on them to take it. The plaintiffs by their reply joined issue generally on the statement of defence, and then pleaded fresh matter. Held, on the motion of the defendants, that the plaintiffs had no right to introduce fresh matter into their reply, and that the same was irrelevant to the issue, and must be struck out: (London and St. Katharine Docks Company v. Metropolitan Railway Company, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 733. Chan. Div.)

LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

At the annual inaugural meeting of this Society on Monday evening last, at the Hall, Strand. There was a large attendance. The chair was taken by Forsyth, Q.C., LL.D., M.P.; and present were Mr. A. G. Marten, Mr. W. T. Gharley, M.P., D.C.L., Mr. M. P. Montague Cookson, Mr. Charles Ford, F.R.S.L., Mr. Shirley, B.A., Professor Sheldon, G. Lake (a member of the Incorporated Society), Mr. Fairfoot, Mr. W. J. T. Davies, S.S.C., Mr. W. Dowson, M.P., &c.

Mr. Forsyth, Q.C., M.P., in rising to address the meeting was received with cheers. He felt some diffidence in addressing the assembly as he saw those "recording reporters" present. The present meeting indeed him of the days of his youth penning life. When he was an undergraduate of the University of Cambridge, he was of the Union Debating Society, and the debates in the exciting times of the Reform Bill. When he came to London to the Bar he was one of the few members of the Royal Society, which used to meet in the Strand, where there were carried on legal questions or topics of the day. He also joined the old Forensic Society, and also discussed points of law. He was a member of the Mansfield Society, in the Strand, most of the members of which had passed away, and the society had almost ceased to exist. This showed the importance of debating societies, and he continued to grow and the more experience the more convinced he was of the importance of them, however little individually had been able to profit of the most interesting, perhaps, debating societies was one of which—the Speculative Society at Edinburgh. It was interesting to give a short account of some members during the last year in the annals of the country, men in the Senate, at the Bar, and in various literature and art. It was established by some young men then pursuing their studies at Edinburgh. To give them an idea of the spirit of that society he would mention a few of the names of the distinguished men afterwards illustrious in public life. Amongst these were Alexander Tytler, Professor Playfair, Lord Woodhouselee, Dugald Stewart, Lord Glenlee, Lord Elgin, Sir James Mackintosh, Charles Hofer, Sir Walter Scott, Lord Jeffrey, Lord Brougham, Francis Horner, Lord Cockburn, the late Marquis of Lansdowne, Professor Wilson, Sir William Hamilton, &c. Before the French Revolution, which was the great conflagration that lit up with lurid fire all the political questions of Europe, such subjects as the following were discussed:—"Whether marriage or the single state tends to promote virtue." (A laugh.) "Is any faith to be given to dreams?" "Was the modesty of the fair sex natural or acquired?" (Laughter.) But after the French Revolution practical politics were much more freely discussed, and questions affecting the Established Religion, Parliamentary Reform, and Women's Rights were gone into. With regard to the last matter, he was glad to see that it had been discussed recently by the members of that society, who had come to the conclusion that the learned professions should be open to women. The United Law Students' Society embraced three objects:—First, the promotion of the interests of law students and of the legal profession; secondly, the acquisition of information upon subjects connected with the study and practice of the law; and, thirdly, the cultivation of the art of public speaking. As to the first it was not necessary for him to say a single word. It was a maxim that it was for the interests of law students and the legal profession that they should meet together to discuss in debates questions of law and of general interest; that they should conduct legal correspondence with all parts of the country; that they should give and receive suggestions, and hold their minds open to all questions of law reform, and be ready to consider the various points of propositions that the ingenuity of man could bring before them. As to the second point, he supposed that their society formed a sort of mimic court of law, and that they used the same arguments and pursued the same analogies as if they were employed as barristers before the High Court of Justice. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance of public discussions to law students. He saw that that week they were going to discuss the following:—"A, riding in a hansom cab, is injured by a collision caused by the negligence of B, and the contributory negligence of the driver of the hansom cab. Can A. successfully sue B?" How could a man argue that question properly without he was acquainted with the law of contributory negligence and agency? (Hear.) But the legal questions happily were not confined merely to technical points of law; they embraced a far wider and a more general scope. There was, for instance, the great question of law reform; and they should seek to enlarge their minds and to strengthen their intellects, so that they might hereafter contribute something towards the improvement of the science of jurisprudence. Looking back a few years to the state of the law as it was, and as it is, there was much ground for thankfulness and hope. The criminal law was formerly written in letters of blood; it was truly a Draconian law, and great efforts were made, even by men like Lord Ellenborough, to reject what were then regarded as dangerous innovations. Our system of civil law was for a long time disgraced and degraded by technicalities, for that abominable system of chicanery called "special pleading," contained in the sixteen volumes of Meeson and Welsby, showed a modicum of misapplied knowledge and perverted ingenuity. It formerly flourished in full vigour, and was a constant source of iniquity and injustice. (Cheers.) Happily these things were changed, and the judges now sought to arrive at the substantial merits of the case, instead of showing their acumen by finding out little quibbling points of law, to the injury of suitors and to the detriment of justice. (Applause.) Then there was the subject of the law of evidence, and also the question of codification. How long were they to allow an incoherent mass of contradictory matter to be scattered through the numerous volumes of law books? Were they never in England to find a man, or a body of men, who would do for them what the jurists of France did at the beginning of the century, and whose labours were contained in the "Code Napoleon?" (Hear.) Then, again, there was the question of the construction of Acts of Parliament. How long were there to be Acts of Parliament of which judges declared their inability to determine the meaning, calling forth the retort on the judges that they were endeavouring to sneer at the wisdom of Parliament. Besides that the legal questions were not confined to a narrow compass. Take, for instance, the wide, important, and almost universal range of constitutional law, and the manner in which its principles bore upon such questions as the Fugitive Slave Circular, Extradition Treaties, prerogative of the Crown to cede territories in time of peace, and also the limitation of English territory, as argued in the case of the Franconia. Again, the members of a society like the one he was addressing might direct their attention to the numerous questions of international law. All these things showed that in discussing legal matters they were not confined to narrow points of technical detail, but they might proceed to the investigation of historical questions. As to logical training, he did not think they could do better than study the judgments of the great minds of the English law. He would instance Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, and Lord Stowell, whose soundness of reasoning, accuracy of logic, and beauty of diction were universally recognised. Logical questions, so far from narrowing the mind enlarge it. It was the remark of Burke that the tendency of the study of the law was rather to sharpen than to enlarge the intellect, though at the same time he paid a fitting tribute to the study. If they would bear with him (Mr. Forsyth) a few moments longer, he would proceed at greater length to refer to the art of public speaking (cheers), which was the third object of this society. He did not forget that he was addressing that night not merely those who would embrace the profession of the Bar, but those who intended to practise as solicitors, and therefore it would appear at first sight that the subject would not interest the latter so much as the former; but they must remember that County Courts were open to solicitors as well as to barristers, and he was told that in the country some of the most successful advocates were not barristers, but solicitors. (Hear, hear.) But whatever occupation a man might follow, at some period of his life he would be called upon to make a speech, and therefore it was highly necessary to cultivate the art of public speaking, so that he ought to learn to speak with something like fluency and ease. He confessed he felt some diffidence in presuming to give them advice on this subject by which they would improve the art of public speaking. Perhaps some of them must be inclined to say what the Athenians remarked to Paul, "What does this babbler say?" (a laugh), but he (Mr. Forsyth) had the consolation of knowing that if he did not serve as an example he could act as a warning. They could criticise his shortcomings, and see how far he fell short of the model he sought to set before them. It would not be denied that Englishmen were not generally so eloquent or as fluent as the Frenchman, who always spoke with fluency and ease, while he was unrivalled in the art of conversation. The Italian, too, could always speak with grace, fluency, and warmth; while the German, who had to deal with the most cumbersome and involved language possible, always spoke with marvellous ease and fluency. An Englishman hesitated, halted, and stammered; he repeated himself, and spoke lamely and haltingly, certainly with pain to himself, giving no great pleasure to his audience. He thought this was due to the fact that in the English character, there were more earnestness and thought as compared with other nations. (Hear, hear.) Englishmen would bestow no care, study, or preparation beforehand. It was an absurdity to suppose that one of the most noble gifts, that of oratory, could be attained without pains, study, reflection, or practice (cheers), and yet he would like to know another country in the world where the rewards of public speaking were so certain, assured, and as easy as in England, or where there were more opportunities. The great secret of the freedom of England was their self government—parish meetings, vestry meetings, and public meetings. Almost every one could become a decent speaker, if he bestowed care, study, and preparation upon his speeches before hand. A born orator was the king of men, [and he was certainly rare in England; but every one could improve his speaking if he took pains to do so. Above all things there should be especially practice, and that was why societies like theirs were so useful. A man should not trust to mere study, or be content with reading the best models, he must accustom himself to the sound of his own voice, and learn to look upon upturned faces, and get rid of that feeling of nervousness and trepidation which often unmanned the strongest mind. If a man did not accustom himself to this in early life, the chance was that he would never succeed in maturer years, and certainly never when he was old. He would advise every young man who attended a society like this never to be ashamed of writing out his speech beforehand. Let him prepare his speech at first by careful composition, saturate his mind with expressions, thoughts, and images, and not trust at first or for a long time to mere extempore inspiration. The finest speeches that came down from antiquity were all written, and some were never spoken. The Greeks and Romans were not ashamed to write out their speeches, and why should Englishmen, for Demosthenes and Cicero were certainly good examples to follow—

Let them not think that he was advising them to get their speeches off by heart, for if they did they would expose themselves, as in the following couplet:

They say that Dudley has no heart, but I deny it;
He has a heart, and gets his speeches by it.

Let them learn to vary their phrases, to make their sentences grammatical, to store their minds with imagery, and put these down on paper, that when they rose to address a meeting, looking at them would refresh their memory, and act as a stepping stone in getting out of the deep water of difficulty, so that in time they would be able to throw away the corks and swim alone. (Cheers.) Lord Brougham copied out eight times the concluding passages of his peroration on Queen Caroline's trial. Let them not think they were born orators, but they should take care by study to qualify themselves for any post they might afterwards fill where oratory was the chief requisite. As far as they could they should always economise their time by making themselves acquainted with the best models—the Greek and Latin writers. Look, too, at the treasures stored up in their own language. He could not conceive a richer treat than the pages of Jeremy Taylor, whose mind was like a fountain; or an author like Barrow, full of massive and robust strength, with a wonderful power of diction. Think, also, of a writer like Burke, one of the few who had been a great writer as well as orator. Surely, if they saturated their minds with authors like these they would be well furnished in debate. (Cheers.) Feed on rich pastures of the vegetation of their mind, and so make it fertile; but never forget the character of the age in which they lived, which was a business-like practical age, for it would be an anachronism and of bad taste to copy a model designed for other times, other climates, and other intellects. (Hear, hear.) They must consider not only the model they were studying, but the audience the orator was addressing, and the times he lived in. Above all things they must avoid declamation, for the most dangerous thing a man could possibly do was to write down or attempt to speak a declamatory speech. With regard to conducting an argument, first of all a case should never be overstated, it being dangerous, enabling an opponent to fasten on the weak flanks and avoid the strong part of the argument. He (Mr. Forsyth) urged them to keep steadily in view the points they wished to contravert, and not to be betrayed into bye-paths, remembering that all errors had a substratum of truth. It was a most useful thing to shift the line of defence into a line of attack. They should not be off the defensive; but having defended their position, to a certain extent, carry the war into the enemy's camp, and make him feel that he at least was as invulnerable as themselves. In conclusion, Mr. Forsyth said that it was impossible to look upon the assembly of youthful faces before him without emotion. There were many now sitting before him who, doubtless, hereafter would rise to eminence and distinction. They should remember that they could never succeed in high life without study and care; they would be probably discouraged, and find the road weary enough, as he had, that led to success; but he advised them never to despair, for depend upon it a way was made for them if they would but persevere. Let them remember that the animating spirit of the legal profession ought to be their sole object, and be determined that the robe of justice, while it was in their keeping, should never be stained by meanness or trickery. They might not succeed, for

'Tis not in mortals to command success;
But we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it.

He would conclude by reciting the following:

A few more storms shall beat
On this wild rocky shore;
And we shall be where tempests cease,
And surges swell no more.

Who would gain a fortune or a coronet at the price of the stings of a self-reproving conscience? (Loud cheers.)

Mr. A. G. Marten, Q.C., M.P., then moved the following resolution:—"That, having regard to the present condition of the law, it is desirable that law students of both branches of the profession should meet together for the consideration and discussion of questions of importance to the profession at large, and the Law Student Societies, as offering facilities for that object, deserve the hearty support of the whole profession. In doing so he congratulated the Society, for the first time, upon having a surplus. (Cheers.) The United Law Students' Society was really the coming law society, embracing as it did members of both branches of the profession. With regard to the terms of the resolution, he thought nothing was more beneficial than that law students should meet together for the discussion of questions of importance to the profession. He would not enter upon the moot point whether barristers and solicitors should undergo the same examination; but, as regarded the latter, they were really the great of private individuals throughout the country, and occupied a position of confidence. Solicitors were entrusted with family secrets, and the confidence placed in them was never betrayed, so that when the question of their passing the same examination as barristers was considered, only the different functions in life they performed must be looked at. But of their meeting together and forming acquaintances, there could be no question. There were hard examinations to be passed for the Bar, so also there were for solicitors; but he thought that neither lectures or examinations formed the real basis of education. (Hear, hear.) Lord Bacon had said, "Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man;" but the exigencies of legal life were such, that in order that a man might be fit for the fulfilment of his legal duties he must not only be a "full man" but also a "ready man," and, above all, he must be an "exact man," so that they could not neglect any one of those three branches of study which were required for the purpose of making a complete professional man. (Cheers.)

Mr. Montague Cookson, Q.C., D.C.L. (the hon. standing counsel of the society), in seconding the resolution, said he had the honour of being connected with this society some years, during which it had undergone a transformation much for the better. It was an essential feature that it was a "United Society." (Hear, hear.) He heartily agreed with the motion of the 17th Jan. last, discussed at the usual weekly meeting, "That Bar students and articled clerks should be educated together, and pass the same examinations." For the first time in 1871, a compulsory examination for the Bar was decided upon by the Inns of Court. (cheers): but he could not see any reason why there should not be one body to examine Bar students and solicitors alike. Depend upon it, when Parliament met, the question of the School of Law would again be brought forward, and he hoped to see the motion carried. (Applause.) He maintained that in a country like England it was the duty of the State to provide competent instruction upon questions of law. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was unanimously carried.

Mr. Serjeant Simon, M.P., then moved the following:—"That it is desirable for law students to consider and discuss questions, not only of purely legal interest, but also of public and general importance, since a lawyer should be as well a man of culture and general information, as also well versed in matters pertaining to his own profession." He fully agreed with what had been said as to the profitable advantages of debating societies like those referred to by the chairman, the primary advantage being that of enabling a young man to form opinions upon the different subjects of the day. He objected to the principle of taking up a certain side in a debate, "for the sake of argument," contending that whatever side they took, it should be from a conscientious conviction that in their minds it was the right one. The cultivation of the intellect should never be at the expense of the moral feelings, for they would deaden and weaken the moral sense if they made it subsidiary to a purely intellectual process. With regard to the terms of the resolution, in which he of course agreed, he could not conceive a more miserable creature than what was called a mere lawyer: a man who knew nothing of the world, but only of the law as laid down in books. He was quite in favour of compulsory legal examination for both branches of the profession, which should take place at the commencement of the students' career. No one should undertake the duties of an advocate, unless he had received the education of a gentleman. (Hear, hear.)

Professor Sheldon Amos, in terms of encouragement to the students, seconded the resolution, which, having been supported by Mr. W. J. Fraser, formerly an active member of the society, in some very appropriate observations, was carried.

Mr. J. T. Davies moved, and Mr. W. Dowson seconded, a resolution to the effect that the thanks of the meeting be given to the friends of legal education who had taken an interest in the society; and to the Hon. Society of Clements' Inn for the use of their hall, and each gentleman in doing so dwelt upon the great benefit which he had derived from taking an active part in the debates and in the management of the society.

The Hon. Secretary of the society (Mr. J. B. Rubinstein), in moving a vote of thanks to the honourable and learned gentleman (Mr. Forsyth) for presiding on the occasion, dwelt upon the great advantage which law students derived from the valuable advice of distinguished men like their chairman, who were always ready to attend gatherings of students such as the present one. He expressed the hope that there would soon be only one Law Students' Society for the whole of London, and he took the opportunity of mentioning that the Council of the Incorporated Law Society had, with the utmost kindness, placed a lecture room and the libraries at the disposal of the society for the purpose especially of meeting to discuss and jurisprudential questions.

Mr. Charles Ford (hon. solicitor of the soc in seconding the vote of thanks to the law chairman, dwelt upon the pleasure which he at being present and at being permitted honour of calling on those present to read hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Forsyth for his and especially interesting address. Mr. Ford minded the students that Mr. Martin had as he saw no reason why students for both branches should not meet at the same debating society that Mr. Cookson had said he saw no reason why all law students should not be taught and examined under one roof, but, added Mr. Ford, he had not been told why it is that, having crossed the Rubicon, having become solicitors, the (solicitors) were placed in a worse and a difficult position than any other of His Majesty's subjects who desired to be called to the Bar. The existing regulations were unjust and unfair, and, assuming that Mr. Serjt. Simon was right in suggesting that the judges of the present day could not hold their own against any of the eminent lawyers who had long ago passed away, it might be in a measure traced to the operation of a monopoly such as that which the Bar enjoyed. Mr. Ford called upon all present support the motion, and declared the same to be carried unanimously.

The learned Chairman, in returning that expressed his readiness to do anything in his power to promote the welfare of the society.

Another meeting of the above society was held at Clements' Inn Hall, Strand, on Wednesday the 24th inst., the following formed the subject of discussion:—"A., riding in a Hansom cab, injured by a collision caused by the negligence of B. and the contributory negligence of the driver of the Hansom cab. Can A. successfully sue B. The case of The Milan (31 L. J. 105 Prob. M.A.) was principally relied on for the affirm. Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115; 13 L. J. C. P.), supported by Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, being cited the negative. After a very full discussion the motion was negatived by a majority of seven, the ground that in spite of The Milan and cases quoted, the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan was still good law, and met the case. The following is to form the subject of the next debate, Wednesday, the 31st instant:—"That the Will Worship Act should be repealed, on the ground that it unduly interferes with the rights of the Church of England."

BOLTON ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

THIS society held its third ordinary meeting Wednesday, 17th Jan. inst., at the Law Society rooms, Wood-street, Bolton, when Mr. Parnell took the chair. A useful essay on "Deeds" was read by Mr. Cullen, after which the chairman, the evening, "Should the acknowledgment of Deeds by Married Women be Abolished?" opened in the affirmative by Mr. Cooper, who was supported by Mr. Balshaw. For the negative there appeared Messrs. Taylor and Hearn and others of the members took part in the debate. There was an equal division of votes on the question, which was decided in the affirmative by casting vote of the chairman.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A GENERAL meeting of this society was held Monday evening last at the County Court Hall, Queen-street, Mr. James Yeoman in the chair. Mr. Priestly opened the evening's debate in the affirmative of the proposition, "That in cases where a judicial separation can now be decreed discretionary power should be given to the court to grant a divorce." Mr. Newton argued in support of the negative. A discussion of an interesting character, joined in by all the members present followed. The question, on being put to the meeting, was decided in favour of the negative, a small majority. The chairman having alluded to the fact that a prominent member of the society, Mr. Piercy, had achieved distinction in the recent LL.B. examination of the University of London, a hearty vote of congratulation accorded to Mr. Piercy on the success which attended his efforts.

HULL LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AN ordinary meeting was held on Tuesday, 16th Jan. The point discussed was, "Can a plaintiff recover for medicine and attendance he is duly registered at the time of the case?" Messrs. Booth and Watson argued in the affirmative, and Messrs. Bell, Lambert, Farrell, the son, and Winter in the negative. The point was decided in the negative.

Another ordinary meeting was held on Wednesday, 23rd Jan., when the following subject was id: "Is Mr. Norwood's Barristers' Fees Bill of support?" The affirmative was taken by Mr. Martinson, and supported by Messrs. Mason, Lambert, Winter and Booth, the negative upheld by Mr. Brown. The question carried in the affirmative.

LEEDS LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

Annual meeting of the above society was on the 22nd inst., in the library at the Philosophical Hall. Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, Q.C. (the guest) occupied the chair. There was a good attendance, which included Mr. Vincent Thompson, Mr. Thomas Marshall (a member of the Leeds of the Incorporated Law Society), and Mr. S. Newstead.

Objects of the society, as stated in the published rules, are the discussion by its members of and jurisprudential subjects, the delivery of essays and the reading of papers on the above subjects, either by its members or by any persons the committee may think fit to invite; the cement of its ordinary members in the study and study of the law; the cultivation of art of public speaking.

President, after expressing the pleasure he as an old articulated clerk, in being present, said that to all law students he would say, be in mind that what you are entering upon is an honourable profession, a profession in which leisure should be to qualify yourself for the which you may be required to undertake; allow your Profession to be degraded into a ; never make the mere acquisition of money the prime object of your labours, but let object be to distinguish yourself in such a way as you may acquire the confidence of those who may come under the influence of your practice.

A law student in the present day stood in a different position from the law students of his When he was an articulated clerk there were no things as examinations, nor were there those as for law students to acquire information and knowledge which existed now-a-days. He could advise the young articulated clerk not to move the details of what might perhaps be the drudgery of the Profession, and, having read the details, let him interest himself in matter of business which his employer gave him opportunity of making himself acquainted with.

He should also pursue his reading systematically. In preparing for examination he should opt a system of mere cramming. The field was so wide that a student would not wisely confined himself to that particular branch which he had a taste. There were some in which the chief business was of a commercial nature, others where it was of a criminal character, and others where it related to conveyance or bankruptcy, and the student would do well to confine himself to the particular branch of law practised in the office where he was articled. In whatever branch he made himself skilled he should do his work thoroughly. But a student should not content himself with a student of law only. He should follow some intellectual pursuits. If he would qualify himself for the honours of the Profession, he would do well to pay attention to the historical of the law, and if he had a taste for classical literature this taste should be cultivated. He should find in the study of botany or geology considerable intellectual enjoyment and a means of diversion. The speaker advised his hearers to all amusements which afforded merely gratification, and said it might not be out of place to give a hint with reference to the habits of young men of the present day if he lifted up a strong voice against that vice which seemed to be prevailing in every direction—the vice of idleness. These suggestions might seem to be inglorious, but they were suggestions of what was intended to benefit them. Let him remember that the branch of the profession to which they belonged was year by year increasing in importance over the other branches of the profession; he believed that the influence of the profession was waxing in every direction, and that those who succeeded in obtaining the right to be entered on the roll of solicitors had before them a field of professional distinction and cement. Municipal honours, and municipal offices, attended with honour, were within reach of all; they might by honourable successful practice so win the confidence and opinion of those among whom they lived that they might become mayors of the various towns in which they practised. Parliamentary honours also open to them. There was also that which was a higher distinction still—namely, the peerage. He mentioned the cases of Justice Field and Justice Manisty as the most recent cases of advancement in life of law students who were articled clerks. The path of preference was thus clear and open to all, and he commended the members of the society upon its constitution. He suggested that as Mr. Serjeant Atkinson was his brother judge in Leeds, he should also be his co-president of the society. (Hear, hear.) He predicted that the proposed fortnightly meeting of the society for the discussion of some legal propositions would result in much good to the students. (Applause.)

Mr. Vincent Thompson said he hoped that the society would have in it more vitality than the one which existed for a short time some years ago. He thought the attendance of students that evening was a good omen for the future. He exhorted his hearers to lay to heart the excellent advice given by the president. In that society the members would get a freshness of knowledge which they would not obtain from mere reading of books, and he hoped that they would take care to make due preparations for the discussions which would take place, for they must bear in mind that the time they occupied in preparing a case for argument at the meeting of that society would be well employed.

The President remarked that when he first went to London he joined a law society for discussion, and the four leading speakers at those meetings afterwards distinguished themselves. They were the late Sir John Holt, the late Mr. Justice Keating, Sir John Byles, and Mr. John Wm. Smith, the author of "Leading Cases."

Mr. Thos. Marshall, M.A., spoke of the value of debating societies in imparting knowledge and in acquiring fluency of expression.

Mr. H. Shaw (hon. secretary), in proposing a vote of thanks to the president, said the society had started with 26 members.

Mr. S. R. Meredith (treasurer) seconded the motion, which was carried, and the meeting concluded.

MANCHESTER LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

The fifth ordinary meeting of this session was held at the Law Library, Cross-street Chambers, on the 16th Jan. 1877. Alfred Singleton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, consented to take the chair in the place of Alfred Hopkinson, Esq., who had been advertised to preside.

Present: Messrs. Donnelly, Wallis, Flower, Atkins, Etheredge, W. Slater, John Simpson, Sykes, Higham, Wilde, Williams, and the secretary. Mr. John William Higson, articled to Mr. Walter Scowcroft, solicitor, Bury, was duly elected an ordinary member of the society.

The following was the subject for the evening's discussion:—In the marshalling of assets, is a widow, as to her paraphernalia deemed to be in the position of a simple contract creditor, and as such entitled to precedence over specific legatees or devisees? (Lord Townsend v. Windham, 2 Ves. Sr. 7; Robert v. Clifford, Amb.; Graham v. Londonderry, 3 Atk. 395; Williams' Real Assets, 118.)

Mr. Atkins, in the absence of Mr. Richardson, opened the evening's debate, remarking that a woman's separate estate was a creature of the Court of Equity. Mr. Higham, in the place of Mr. Jones in the negative, quoted the case of Burton v. Pierrepont (2 Pl. Williams 79). Mr. Donnelly, in the affirmative, read a passage from Blackstone's Commentaries; and Mr. Wallis in the negative, laid particular stress on the word "specific," although he admitted the widow's resemblance to a simple contract creditor. Mr. Flower, for the affirmative, brought forward the case of Poynton v. Poynton.

The secretary and Mr. Walter Slater also addressed the meeting, and thereupon Mr. Atkins replied, contending that Burton v. Pierrepont was not a decision on the point at issue. The learned chairman, in summing up, dwelt upon the cases which had been cited, and also on the case of Tipping v. Tipping. On the motion being put to the meeting it was carried in the affirmative.

A vote of thanks having been tendered to the learned chairman, and acknowledged by him in appropriate terms, the proceedings came to a conclusion.

SOUTHAMPTON LAW DEBATING SOCIETY.

The first annual meeting of this society was held at No. 6, Portland-street, on Thursday, the 18th inst., C. F. Lucas, Esq., solicitor, in the chair. The committee's report and treasurer's account were passed, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, P. M. Leonard, Esq.; vice-presidents, E. S. Pearce, Esq., and H. G. Green, Esq.; treasurer, Mr. H. D. M. Page; committee, Messrs. J. H. Candy, C. F. Lucas, B. Kelly, A. W. Pearce, C. Lampert, and M. Mosely; secretary, Mr. C. H. H. Candy; auditor, Mr. I. Harle. The thanks of the society were accorded to Mr. Lampert on his resigning the post of secretary, and to Mr. J. W. Flemming, the late treasurer, for the able and energetic manner in which they had discharged their duties during the past year. The subject for debate, "Should suicide be held to be a crime?" was then opened by Mr. M. P. Kemp in the affirmative, to whom was opposed Mr. Mosely. After several gentlemen had spoken on the subject, and the chairman had summed up, the question was decided in the affirmative by a majority of four. A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the proceedings. The society, which now numbers thirty-one ordinary and thirteen honorary members, is to be congratulated on its flourishing condition generally, and especially on the state of its finances.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—REPUGNANCY—ADMISSIBILITY OF COUNTERPART.—Where two parts of a lease are inconsistent the counterpart may be referred to for the purpose of determining which is correct. In a lease the term was stated in the habendum as ninety-four and a quarter years, and in the reddendum as ninety-one and a quarter. In the counterpart it was ninety-one and a quarter in both places. After ninety-one and a quarter, but before ninety-four and a quarter years had expired, the owner of the reversion sued the assignee of the lease in ejectment. Held, by Cockburn, C.J., and Bramwell and Amphlett, J.J.A. (reversing the judgment of the Common Pleas Division), that the term was ninety-one and a quarter years, and therefore plaintiff was entitled to recover. Kelly, C.B., dissented. (Burchell v. Clerk (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 690. Ct. of App.))

WILL—SHIFTING CLAUSE—ELDEST SON—CONSTRUCTION.—A testator devised certain real estate to the use of R., the second son of Sir T. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to J., the third son of Sir T., for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to C., the fourth son of T., for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the testator's right heirs. And the testator declared that in case the said R., or J., or C., should become the eldest son of Sir T., then and in such case, and so often as the same should happen, the estate therebefore devised to him becoming the eldest son of Sir T. and the remainder to the first and other sons of his body should cease, determine, and become void, as if he were actually dead without issue male of his body, and the devised estate should go to the use of such person or persons as by virtue of the devise thereinbefore contained would then be entitled as the person or persons next in remainder to the same estate, in case such person so becoming the eldest son of Sir T. was then dead without issue male. The testator died in 1819. Sir T. died in 1841, and was succeeded in the title and family estates by his eldest son, on whose death without issue, in 1863, R. succeeded to the title, but not to the family estates. On R.'s death without issue, in 1875, J. succeeded to the title, but not to the family estates. C. had previously died without issue. The testator's heir-at-law filed a bill claiming to be entitled to the devised estate on the ground that J. by becoming sole surviving son had become "the eldest son of Sir T." within the meaning of the shifting clause. Held (Bramwell, J.A. dissentiente), that a younger son could not become "eldest son" within the meaning of the shifting clause after the death of his father, and that as Sir T.'s eldest son had survived him the shifting clause never took effect. Decision of Jessel, M.R. reversed. (Harvey Bathurst v. Stanley; Craven v. Stanley, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 709. Ct. of App.)

WILL—CONSTRUCTION—LIFE INTEREST—CHILDREN OF DECEASED DAUGHTER.—A testator bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees, in trust for all his children, who, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being daughters, should attain that age, or be married, in equal shares, the share of each of his sons to be for his own absolute use and benefit. And as to the share of each of his daughters in the said trust estate, the same should be held by his trustees, in trust to pay her the income during her life, and after her death, in trust for her children. Held, that the children of a daughter who died after the date of a will, but before the testator, were entitled to the share their mother would have taken for life: (Unsworth v. Speakman, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 731. Chan. Div.)

DANGEROUS PROPERTY—ARTIFICIAL RESERVOIRS—ACT OF GOD—DAMAGE—OWNER'S LIABILITY.—The defendant was the owner of a series of artificial lakes, which had existed for a long time without causing damage. Upon a most unusual rainfall—occurring, the bank at the end of the higher lake gave way, and the water rushing with great violence into the lakes below, caused their banks also to give way, and the aggregate volume of water from the lakes rushing down the valley, caused damage to certain county bridges lower down the stream. On the trial of an action by the plaintiff, the surveyor of the county, against the defendant to recover for the damage done to the bridges, the jury found that there had been no negligence in the construction or the maintenance of the lakes, but that if the flood had been anticipated, the effect might have been prevented. Held (affirming the decision of the Exchequer Division below), that the rainfall being so unusual as to amount to vis major or the act of God, the defendants was not liable. (Nicholls v. Marsland, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 725 Ct. of App.)

LIABILITY OF RAILWAY—NEGLIGENCE—TRAIN OVERTHOOTING PLATFORM.—In an action for negligence the question whether the facts amount to negligence is for the jury. Plaintiff was a passenger by defendants' railway. The train in which she was overtook the platform. The porters called to the passengers to keep their seats, but not so that plaintiff could hear. The train was not backed. Plaintiff waited some time, and then got out, and was injured in alighting. Held, reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Division, that there was evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the defendants: (Rose v. North-Eastern Railway Company, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 693. Ct. of App.)

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

PAUPER LUNATIC—LUNATIC ASYLUMS' ACT—MAINTENANCE.—Under sect. 96 of the Lunatic Asylums' Act 1853 a retrospective order may be made by the justices for the maintenance of a pauper lunatic for a longer period than twelve months. J. P. was convicted of felony at York on the 18th Oct. 1869. He was removed to plaintiffs' asylum on the 28th Sept. 1870, and his sentence expired 18th Feb. 1871, when he became a lunatic wandering at large. The corporation of York paid for his maintenance up to June 1873, when they refused to do so any longer. In Oct. 1875 plaintiffs obtained an order from two visiting justices upon the defendants for maintenance for J. P. for two years and a quarter. This defendants refused to pay. Held, that under sect. 96 of the Lunatic Asylums' Act 1853, the justices had power to make such an order: (Finch v. The Guardians of York Union, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 708. Q. B.)

EQUITY TO A SETTLEMENT—CHILDREN BY A FORMER MARRIAGE—WHOLE FUND SETTLED.—A married woman, a lady living apart from her husband, became entitled to a fund of about £3000. The income of this fund, added to her present income, would make up her total income to about £3000 a year. Her husband was unable to contribute anything towards her maintenance. Held, that she was entitled, as against her husband and his incumbrancers, to have the whole fund settled. She had two children by a former marriage, but none by her present marriage. The two children were of age and well provided for, independently of their mother. Held, that they must be included in the settlement, and that the court could not enter upon any inquiry as to their means: (Conington v. Gilliat, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736. Chan. Div.)

THE WRECK COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

SOME remarks of importance as to the procedure in formal investigations under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876 occur in the official report of the formal investigation into the circumstances attending the stranding of the British sailing ship Rescue, of London, on the morning of Sunday, the 3rd Dec. 1876, on the rocks north of Alnmouth, held before the Wreck Commissioner, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on the 16th and 18th Dec.

The Commissioner said: Before I proceed to deal with the facts of this case, it may be well to state the course which these proceedings have taken. When the case was called on, finding that neither the owners nor the officers of the ship were represented before the court, I asked whether anyone would appear for them, and was informed that they had employed a solicitor, but that he did not propose to appear until it was seen whether a charge would be preferred against the officers or not. I thereupon informed them that such a course might place them at a great disadvantage, as they might thus have no opportunity of offering explanations on points on which it might seem to be necessary. Mr. Hamel, who appeared for the Board of Trade, stated that he believed it was owing to some misapprehension as to the practice that would be followed that the solicitor for the officers was not then present; he probably thought that the same course which had been taken in a recent case before the magistrates at Sunderland would be followed in this case; and that if the Board of Trade, after hearing the evidence of the witnesses from the ship, should think proper to make a charge, the whole of the evidence would be gone into again; that in fact it would be considered as a new proceeding. I stated that such a course appeared to me to be open to very grave objections, and that it was not one which I intended to follow; moreover, that it appeared to me that the rules were very clear and explicit upon the subject, for the 18th rule provides that after a charge had been made, and the defendant had appeared, the Board of Trade should produce "any further witnesses" whom they might wish to examine, evidently implying that some witnesses had been already examined, and that the Board of Trade was at liberty either to rely upon the evidence already given, or, if it thought fit, produce "further" evidence in support of the charge, and that in fact the whole must be regarded as one continuous proceeding. Mr. Hamel stated that that was certainly the view that he had taken of the rules, and at my suggestion he sent a message to the solicitor who had been retained for the officers, to inform him of the course which I had proposed to adopt.

The solicitor, however, not appearing, the cause proceeded, and all the survivors from the ship, six in number, one of them having died since, were produced and examined. And at the conclusion of their examination Mr. Hamel stated that it was his intention to prefer charges against the master and the mate, who thereupon applied for an adjournment, and it being then nearly four o'clock on Saturday, I adjourned the further hearing until Monday morning, the 18th, at ten.

On the hearing being resumed, Mr. Bush, solicitor, appeared for the master and mate, and asked that all the evidence might be read over. I, however, declined to accede to his application, but at the same time informed him of the points which, in our opinion, appeared to press most strongly against his clients. But whilst I objected to have the whole of the evidence gone over again, I stated that as his absence on the previous occasion was due to some misapprehension as to the practice which would follow, I was prepared, having the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence before me, to read to him such parts thereof as he might wish. I added that he would of course be entitled to recall any of the witnesses who had been already examined, and to produce any further witnesses he might wish.

Mr. Bush thereupon expressed himself quite satisfied, and stated that as he now knew what were the parts of the case which seemed to press upon the mind of the court, he would not trouble me to read any of the evidence, as he was already fully informed of the facts. He however asked to be allowed to recall the master, the mate, and an apprentice named Bass who had been examined on the Saturday, which was accordingly done, and they were examined and cross-examined as to the circumstances. No further witnesses having been called the case was concluded.

COUNTY COURTS.

MANCHESTER COUNTY COURT

Friday, Jan. 12.

(Before J. A. RUSSELL, Esq., Q.C., J.P.)
GLAZIER v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Contract—Single Regulation of traffic.

THE action was brought to recover damages from the defendants for breach of agreement.

The plaintiff, Mr. William Glasier, was represented by Addison.

The defendants by Jordan.

Addison, in opening the case, said it was an important one, and had been submitted to him by counsel in London, who had given an opinion in plaintiff's favour. Proceedings were commenced in a superior court, but were afterwards withdrawn, and the present action brought. The plaintiff was a member of the Rochdale Working Men's Club, and this club had arranged an excursion to London on Saturday, Aug. 11. The most important part of the programme was to arrange with the railway company to provide a special train, and Mr. Glasier, on behalf of the committee of the club, had an interview with the secretary of the company, who promised to provide them with the special train. Mr. Glasier pointed out to the secretary that it was an important thing that the members of the club should travel together, there being some kind of understanding that the members of an association club—a club of different politics to themselves—might be allowed to mix with them, and that of things would have been unpleasant to the members of the Working Men's Club. The secretary of the company promised to let them have a train to themselves, and so far as the journey to London was concerned his promise was absolute. The excursion was to return from King's Cross Station, on the Wednesday evening at 10 o'clock, a number of the party arriving at the station at 10 o'clock they found that the railway company, instead of providing for their special train, had connected two trains together. It seemed that the Conservative Association of Rochdale had also had a trip to London, and the train was timed to leave King's Cross at 10 o'clock the same night. The official of the railway had connected these two trains together, intending that they should be drawn by the same engine. The statement of the plaintiff was that the Conservatives were distributed in the coaches throughout the entire length of the train, and he and other members of the committee insisted upon being taken back to Rochdale in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Failing to induce the officials to run a special train, Mr. Glasier said that extra carriages were placed at the end of the train, and his party kept separate from the Conservatives. The railway authorities, however, would not let him reason in the matter, and consequently a number of the members of the Working Men's Club were prevented from returning in the train they desired, and about 122 went to the Railway Station, and came back to Rochdale on an ordinary train. The plaintiff felt personally injured in the matter, and that was the reason why he brought that action. The question was that the railway company should be bound to certain number of tickets, and there was a separate contract sum claimed by Mr. Glasier was 17s., the cost of the third-class fare from London to Manchester, and his object in bringing the action was to show the company that they ought not to break their agreement.

Jordan asked the judge to nonsuit the case on the opening of counsel. The contract the company had made was to run a special train from Rochdale to London, via Oldham, and the company reserved to themselves the right to attach other carriages to the train.

His HONOUR said that clause was not an agreement.

Jordan said that did not materially object. In returning from London the company placed two trains together for public use, each portion was divided by a guard's van, Conservatives being in front and the Working Men's Club in the rear. When they became aware of this, they went to another station and by another line, and he submitted that it was no right to do so, as there was plenty of room in the train in question.

His HONOUR.—The only question I decide is whether or not there was a breach of contract at half-past ten o'clock.

Jordan said that action was brought in order, if a verdict were given against the company. He submitted that under the Judicature Act the whole of the plaintiff's case upon one contract, and not split it up into actions.

BOROUGH QUARTER SESSIONS.

Borough.	When holden.	Recorder.	What notice of appeal to be given.	Clerk of the Peace.
Andover .....	Saturday, Feb. 3 .....	W. W. Ravenhill, Esq. ....	10 days .....	Thomas Lamb.
New Windsor .....	Friday, Feb. 3 .....	A. M. Skinner, Esq., Q.C. ....	10 days .....	Henry Darvill.
Nottingham .....	Tuesday, Feb. 6 .....	Richard Wildman, Esq. ....	1 day .....	Arthur Wells.
Salisbury .....	Wednesday, Jan. 31 .....	J. D. Chambers, Esq. ....	10 days .....	Francis Hodding.
Worcester .....	Thursday, Feb. 1 .....	W. J. Nelson Neale, Esq. ....	10 days .....	Samuel Wilkinson.

HONOUR said that they could do so without the Act, because each passenger had a ticket, and each ticket was a separate contract. The railway company attached the two trains together to avoid danger on the line, he would not say that that was a reasonable thing to do. The plaintiff said that that was what the railway company had done.

For the defence, said the company it was advisable for the public safety to make the two trains into one, keeping one part separate from the other, and stationing porters on the platform to direct the Conservatives to the front and the Liberals to the back. Mr. Glasier objected to this arrangement, and asked for a special train. The Inspector told him he could not have one. The reason why the trains were joined was because the Conservatives were few in number, and the Liberals were more numerous; but the truth was the company would have carried the whole party if it had not been for the intervention of Mr. Glasier, who got his back up, and got on his comrades to get out of the train. He said that the company, in the exercise of its discretion, had a perfect right to couple the trains together, and that Mr. Glasier could not sue his action after inviting 120 people to the carriages. Without arguing the question, he submitted that one person could sue himself out and bring an action for breach of contract. The contract was for 300, and the plaintiff stipulated upon was £225. But the members of the club had themselves violated the contract by charging a higher fare than that stipulated, and he contended that they had not any damages by reason of their not being brought back to Rochdale by a train.

On the facts being proved as opened, the plaintiff stopped the case, saying Mr. Glasier need not proceed any further. There were no questions in the case. The first was whether or not Mr. Glasier had a right in law to sue without reference to the facts. To prevent misconception, he thought it his duty to give his opinion on the question, although it was not the point he would decide the case. In law, Mr. Glasier had a right to sue upon the contract, because the workman's club was a club consisting of individuals, and not a corporation of any kind. The company agreed not to provide a train, but to deliver tickets, the effect of that was to give each holder a ticket against the company. Then, of course, the question whether there was a breach of contract. By the contract the workman's club had a right to be carried in a train by themselves, of course, to the working committee of the company. The evidence showed that the authorities deemed it necessary for the safety of the passengers to couple the trains together, but at the same time they took the precaution to keep them separate from each other by a brake van between them. He was to say, according to his judgment, that this was a perfectly reasonable and proper mode of running the traffic upon the line, and it was no breach of the agreement, because the plaintiff had to be carried in carriages with their friends, and none other. Such a condition was provided, and although there was a right to sue in point of law, there was, in fact, a breach of the agreement. There would be no action for the railway company, with costs.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BUILDING CONTRACT—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—BREACH—PROOF—BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869, s. 31.—In April, a building contractor entered into a contract with the governors of a school to build and complete a school house by the end of the year. The contract contained a variety of provisions, with remedies for the breach of them, among other things, that the contractor should pay to the governors the sum of £1000 every week after the end of the year in which the works should remain unfinished; and ended with a clause providing that in case the contractor was not in all things duly performed, he should pay to the governors a sum of £1000 as and for liquidated damages. The contractor failed before the end of the year, and the trustee in bankruptcy abandoned the contract. Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, J., in Re B. & C.) that the sum of £1000 was really a penalty, and the governors were entitled to prove the amount of damages actually occasioned by the breach of the contract: (Ex parte Capper; re B. & C., 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 718. Ct. of App.)

DULUTY PREFERENCE—RULES OF STOCK EXCHANGE—BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869, s. 6, sub. s. 92.—A stockbroker and member of the Stock Exchange, finding himself unable to meet his engagements, wrote to the secretary of the Stock Exchange to that effect, and was declared a defaulter. On the following day he attended a meeting of his Stock Exchange creditors, who, having heard his statement of debts and assets, agreed to accept a composition from him. At the request of the official assignees of the Stock Exchange, and in compliance with the rules of that body, he handed over to them his balance at the banker's, which formed the greater part of his assets, for distribution among his Stock Exchange creditors. At the meeting at which the creditors resolved to accept the composition the debtor stated that he had no creditors outside the Stock Exchange, and that certain large advances which were known to have been made to him by his father-in-law had been made by way of gift, and not by way of loan. This was not correct, and a few days afterwards he was adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of his father-in-law, and the trustee in bankruptcy claimed the money which had been paid to the Stock Exchange assignees and by them distributed among the Stock Exchange creditors in accordance with the regulations of the Stock Exchange. Held, that the money must be refunded, inasmuch as any casus bonorum made by an insolvent on the eve of his bankruptcy for the benefit of some only of his creditors, to the exclusion of the rest, is a fraud upon the bankruptcy laws. (Ex parte Saffrey; Re Cooke, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715. Ct. of App.)

CHANGE OF TRUSTEE AND SOLICITOR—SOLICITOR'S LIEN—BANKRUPTCY RULES 1870, r. 249.—A trustee in bankruptcy was removed from his office and a new trustee appointed. The old trustee's solicitor, on being applied to, gave up all the account books of the estate, but refused to deliver up certain documents and papers on which he had expended labour as solicitor, and upon which he claimed a lien for costs. Thereupon the new trustee applied to the court for an order upon the old trustee and his solicitor to deliver up all documents relating to his office as trustee. Held, that the solicitor was entitled to a lien on the documents which he had retained, and that the old trustee was not bound to discharge that lien by paying the costs out of his own pocket: (Ex parte Yalden; Re Austin, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 720. Ct. of App.)

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Friday, Jan. 19, 1876.

WILSON AND BROWN v. BRESLAUER.

Bankruptcy Act 1869, ss. 31 and 126—Composition—Imperfect proof.

THIS was a case which was partly argued last Monday. It was an action tried before Cockburn, C.J., at the Hertford Summer Assizes, and now came before the court for argument on cross motions.

Philbrick, Q.C. and Grantham, M.P. appeared for the plaintiff.

Lumley Smith was for the defendant.

The action was brought to recover money paid on a bail bond with respect to the collision of a ship, the Ringdove, with another vessel, the W. H. B., and the defence raised was that the defendant had been obliged to compound with his creditors, and that the plaintiffs had been assenting parties to the composition. The proceedings at the trial with respect to the claims of the two plaintiffs somewhat differed—the claim of Wilson resting upon a question of fact, and that of Brown turning upon a point of law.

With regard to the first, it was proved at the trial that Wilson's name did not appear on the list of creditors in any other way than as Wilson Brothers, and that the liabilities of the defendant to Wilson Brothers arose out of transactions which had no connection with the present claim, which was one between John Wilson in person and the defendant. The defendant then relied on a written agreement between himself and Wilson Brothers, which, he contended, specifically included and settled the present claim; and upon this point, in which the evidence was somewhat conflicting, the jury found in his favour; but a rule was afterwards granted for a new trial, which was one of the cross motions argued to-day.

With regard to the plaintiff Brown, the defence turned upon a point of law, that as Brown's name and address had been inserted in the list of creditors, and he had proved for a debt, he could not split his debt and prove afterwards for a contingent liability on the bail bond, which might have been valued at the time of the composition under which Brown had acted.

The arguments on this point, which, at the suggestion of the court, was discussed first, occupied some time. At their conclusion,

Lord COLERIDGE gave judgment in favour of the defendant. The question, his Lordship said, rested upon the true construction of the 126th section of the Bankruptcy Act, and various points had been insisted on for the plaintiff which it was as well to dispose of. It had been suggested that the plaintiff had no notice of the meeting, because he had only been scheduled as Arthur Brown and Co., whereas he had attended and proved as Arthur Brown, and notice had been given to him that it was a private debt. It was admitted in the case that Arthur Brown and Co. and Arthur Brown were the same, and it had been repeatedly held that notice meant knowledge. The plaintiff had come in under the composition, and proved, and had received instalments of his dividend. It was plain, therefore, that he had knowledge. It was also said that the amount of the debt was not duly stated by the debtor nor, in fact, was it, for the statement being for £588, the plaintiff had proved for something over £1000. It was also admitted that neither in the statement of the debtor, nor proof of the creditor, was the debt which was the subject-matter of this action included, and, as a matter of fact, that debt had not been made the subject-matter of any composition. The question, therefore, was whether that debt was barred. He was of opinion that it was. The debt was for a contingent liability, and was provable in bankruptcy, under the 31st section of the Act. The 126th section of the Act regulated the proceedings in composition; and the 270th rule explained that all debts provable under bankruptcy were provable under proceedings in composition. Was the plaintiff, therefore, a person whom the composition deed barred? Upon this he was of opinion that the recent case of Campbell v. Im Thurm, decided in this court, was conclusive against the plaintiff. In that case it was held if a creditor assented to the composition he was bound by it, even although his name and address did not appear in the debtor's statement. In the present case the name and address were entered, but the debt itself was inaccurately stated. He could see no sensible distinction between these two omissions. The true object was to give notice to all the creditors; and if a creditor knew that his debt was wrongly entered, rules were provided by which the mistake could be rectified. It was part of the consideration for the composition that it was to release the compounding debtor from all his debts; and it would be contrary to the whole policy of the law if a particular creditor, knowing proceedings were going on, knowing he had a claim, though partly contingent, was to content himself with an imperfect proof, and was afterwards to come forward and claim in full for a contingent liability which he refused to have valued at the time. It seemed to him, therefore, upon the authority referred to, and the true view of the 126th section of the Act, that this was a debt provable in bankruptcy, and therefore provable in composition, and that the debt was one from which the debtor would be discharged as against an assenting creditor, and that the plaintiff was an assenting creditor, with nothing in the terms of the Act to exempt him from its operation.

GROVE, J., was of the same opinion. A composition would be an idle ceremony if each creditor was, so to speak, to play his own game, and to keep secret from his brother creditors debts which he held in reserve. It was admitted this could not be done in bankruptcy, and no distinction existed which would admit of such a course under composition.

DENMAN, J., also concurred.

The COURT then proceeded to hear the rule argued, which the plaintiff Wilson had obtained for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and, in the end, after Lumley Smith had showed cause, they discharged the rule.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS (1875).

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

By the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), the whole of the prior law of bankruptcy was repealed. Pursuant to the 59th section of the Act, the Bankruptcy Court consists of the London Court and local courts. The district of the London Court comprises the City of London and Liberties thereof, and all places situated within the districts of the Metropolitan County Courts.

The Local Bankruptcy Courts are the County Courts.

By the 130th section of the Act, the former country district courts of bankruptcy were abolished.

The London Court consists of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy and such number of Registrars, not exceeding four, clerks, ushers, and other subordinate officers, as may be determined by the Chief Judge, with the sanction of the Treasury.

An appeal lies to the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy from the decisions in respect of matters of fact or law of the local bankruptcy courts; and the orders of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy are subject to an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. There is a further appeal to the House of Lords, but only with leave of the Court of Appeal.

Provision is also made by the Act for trial by jury.

The practice and procedure of the courts are regulated by orders and rules issued by the Lord Chancellor, with the advice of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

Imprisonment for debt is abolished by the Debtors' Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), with exceptions stated in the Act.

To bring a person within the control of the Bankruptcy Laws there must have been committed by such person one or more of six acts or defaults called acts of bankruptcy, specified in the Act, on which a petition is to be grounded. These are as follows: (1.) That the debtor has made a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee or trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally. (2.) That the debtor has made a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his property, or of any part thereof. (3.) That he has, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, departed out of England; or, being out of England, remained out of England; or, being a trader, departed from his dwellinghouse, or otherwise absented himself, or began to keep house, or suffered himself to be outlawed. (4.) That he has filed in the court a declaration admitting his inability to pay his debts. (5.) That execution issued against the debtor on any legal process, for the purpose of obtaining payment of not less than £50., has in the case of a trader been levied by seizure and sale of his goods. (6.) That the creditor presenting the petition has served in the prescribed manner on the debtor, a debtor's summons, requiring the debtor to pay a sum due of an amount of not less than £50., and the debtor, being a trader, has, for the space of seven days, or, not being a trader, for the space of three weeks succeeding the service of such summons, neglected to pay such sum, or to secure or compound for the same. But no person can be adjudged bankrupt unless the act of bankruptcy on which the petition for adjudication is grounded has occurred within six months before presentation of the petition. The sum due by the debtor must be of an amount of not less than £50. When a debtor's summons is served the debtor may, within seven days if a trader, or three weeks if not a trader, pay or secure or compound for his debt.

A petition for adjudication of bankruptcy can only be presented by a creditor or creditors jointly, and no longer by the debtor himself, as under the Act of 1861.

As soon as an order has been made adjudging the debtor a bankrupt, a general meeting of creditors, called the first meeting of creditors, is called, by whom a fit person, whether a creditor or not, is appointed to fill the office of trustee of the property of the bankrupt; inspectors are also appointed to superintend the administration by the trustees of the bankrupt's property.

When all the property has been realised, and a final dividend declared, or a composition or arrangement has been completed, the bankruptcy is closed; and if a dividend of not less than ten shillings in the pound has been declared, or the creditors resolve that the bankruptcy, or the failure to pay ten shillings in the pound, was involuntary on the part of the bankrupt, he may obtain his discharge. Under certain circumstances the discharge may be suspended or withheld by the court. If no discharge is granted, the bankrupt is left unmolested for three years, after which the court may make such order in the matter as it thinks fit.

Further, the affairs of a debtor may be settled by liquidation by arrangement, under the 125th section of the Act, or, under 126th section, by composition with the creditors, without any proceedings in bankruptcy.

By the 115th section of the Act, the registrars and other officers are required to make returns of the business of their respective courts and offices to the Comptroller in Bankruptcy, by whom a general annual report, judicial and financial, is required to be made to the Lord Chancellor, and to be laid before Parliament.

BUSINESS AT THE COMMON LAW JUDGES' CHAMBERS.—The numerous complaints which from time to time have appeared in your columns of the conduct of business at judges' chambers has now culminated to a point at which a remedy must be applied, or the result of the present ~~system~~ must be disastrous not only to solicitors but One day this week (and it is not exceptional in the Exchequer Division) there was but one clerk to draw up orders and issue summonses. The result was that, notwithstanding his well-intentioned industry, he could not draw up the orders made that day, nor could he even issue all the summonses required for time, and so forth, and at four o'clock he declined to issue any more summonses, and our clerk, who had been waiting his turn for some time with twelve to twenty other clerks, had to leave without getting the summons he required, and was consequently at the mercy of the solicitors for plaintiffs in the actions. This is not, as we state before, exceptional, nor is it confined to the Exchequer Division. There is a manifest want of more chamber clerks to cope with the amount of work to be done.

REPLEVIN BOND.—In the two forms of replevin bonds given in the schedule of forms (Nos. 183 and 184) to the County Court Rules 1875, is the following note: "This bond does not require a stamp. See 5 Geo. 4 c. 41." That statute was, however, repealed by the Inland Revenue Repeal Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. 99), and this fact is noticed in the County Court Rules 1876 in the following note: "Replevin bonds now require to be stamped, as 5 Geo. 4, c. 41, referred to in the Forms 183 and 184, is repealed by the Stamp Act 1870." Surely the framers of this note have overlooked the fact that at the end of this schedule to the Stamp Act 1870 are given certain "General Exemptions from all Stamp Duties," amongst which are included (tit. 5) "Bonds given to sheriffs or other persons upon the replevy of any goods or chattels, and assignments of such bonds." If I am correct the note is misleading, and replevin bonds do not require any stamp.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENCY.—I have read the recent articles in the Times and also in your paper on the subject of commissions. I observe Sir Edmund Beckett, the talented leader of the Parliamentary Bar, has been taking part in the Times in the general question. I wonder if he is cognisant of the subject of complaint in your article of the 13th in reference to Parliamentary agents. If so (he is a man of power we all know), I feel sure that if the subject were brought before him a remedy would very speedily be found. I offer this as a suggestion. The whole Profession is concerned in seeing the evil rooted out.

THE POWER OF THE COURT OF BANKRUPTCY TO RESTRAIN ACTIONS.—DEFAULT OF PAYMENT OF COMPOSITION.—Having recently had occasion to look up the law on the above subject I derived much pleasure in reading the article which appeared in the LAW TIMES of the 6th Jan., and, with your permission, I will make one or two observations. As to the remarks of James, L.J., which are quoted from the report in Re Hatton, I think these were subsequently qualified by Mellish, L.J., in the case of Ex parte Peacock, re Duffield (L. Rep. 8 Ch. 723), where he is reported to have said, "It is no doubt true that in the case of Re Hatton we guarded ourselves by saying there might be cases where by possibility relief might be given to the debtor; but I am rather disposed to think, upon consideration, that such relief must be granted upon some act done on the part of the creditor which makes it inequitable that he should enforce his strict legal right." So that if perchance in a case where a composition note happened to be dishonoured by a bank merely because by mistake the debtor had advised the note a few shillings beyond the amount, still, as there was no default of the creditor, and although there was money in the bank sufficient and more than sufficient to meet the note, the creditor would be entitled to sue for the full amount. It will be seen, therefore, that the equitable ground of relief given in such cases is very narrow. But I think there is another and far more important ground upon which an action will be restrained, that is, in certain cases where a trustee has been appointed to receive and distribute the composition. There certainly is a distinction between a composition with a trustee and without one. And the case of Campbell v. Im Thurn (L. Rep. 1 C. P. D. 274) is exhaustive upon the subject. There Brett, J. draws a wide distinction between the two. Now, in the case which I have instanced, i.e., default in payment of a promissory note by a bank merely because the note is advised beyond the amount of the bill—assume a trustee to have been appointed, and the trustee to have prepared the notes and named his own bankers. It appears to me that, having regard to Campbell v. Im Thurn, the creditor would not be successful in an action for the full amount of his debt on the ground that payment to the bank was virtually payment to the trustee. If, therefore, in compositions where trustees are appointed and taken, unless the creditors expressly provide in default of payment their original right revive, I think they will be restrained for the full amount.

QUERIES.

71. COMMISSIONER TO ADMINISTER OATHS TO SOLICITORS.—The authorised form of oath to be appointed a commissioner sets out that he "has practised as a solicitor" for so many years as a managing clerk who has been in the habit of just as responsible work as his principal, in advocacy, the latter on partnership terms, is called a practising solicitor? Would his title be any stronger for his being a sleeping partner?

[If you can comply with the requirements as we find them in Ford's Handbook on the edit, p. 43, the mere fact of your being a clerk, should make no difference. You must put a certificate for six years.—Ed. Sol's. Bm]

72. ADVOCACY.—Can you or any of your list commend a practical work on advocacy? [Mr. Serjeant Cox is the author of such a work.]

73. LIABILITY OF COUNSEL FOR NEGLIGENCE.—Be much obliged if you will refer me to any of the LAW TIMES, or any pamphlet or other containing arguments tending to show that the Mr. Norwood's bill which would enable him to recover their fees and render them liable for is unworthy of support? SARL. Bm

74. SUBPENA—CONDUCT MONEY.—A. is a B., the plaintiff, to attend and give evidence in a hearing of an action in the county court, and subpoena was tendered 5s. for conduct and attends and gives evidence. On tender (plaintiff obtaining verdict), the registrar of A.'s attendance £1 2s. 6d. B. pays him 2s. 6d. is entitled to deduct the 5s. paid for costs from the amount allowed by the registrar. Is

75. MORTGAGE.—In 1863 a mortgage on land was transferred to A., who thereupon acknowledged (unstamped) that the money was not his own, but the money of B., and mortgage was transferred to him for B.'s undertaking, at B.'s request and costs, to the mortgage to B., or as he should appoint. A. died, leaving an infant heir, but having no will which contains no devise of trust and mortgage or any disposition relating to the above transaction, but appoints executors, Can A.'s trustee of the mortgage who could legally sue B.?

76. CERTIFICATED CONVEYANCER.—I shall be much obliged if you will refer me to the requisite information. You were good enough to insert a query on this subject for me in the LAW TIMES some three weeks ago; but I am sorry to say it has elicited no reply. ALB. Bm

77. DEEDS DATED AS OF A SUNDAY.—When partnership are entered into and signed, but not dated, and afterwards dated and by mistake and then stamped, would this be void on Sunday be void? CLARENCE Bm

78. ACT OF GOD.—Where a railway company near a river, and in the night there is a fire on the river which causes damages to the company's possession, would they be held liable if it be taken as an act of God for which they are not responsible? CLARENCE Bm

Answers.

(Q. 60). LEASES—COSTS.—The terms may be but this does not affect the question of liability costs of the preparation of a lease under the terms. If a lease is prepared at the request, the consent, of the lessee, he is, in the absence of express contract to the contrary, liable for the preparation of such lease. Supposing a lessor often the case, enters into possession of the land agreed to be demised upon the understanding that a solicitor, should subsequently prepare the lease he is instructed accordingly. The lease is prepared, and a question arises between the parties as to the insertion of some particular and, in consequence, the lessee declines to accept the lease. Surely any such disagreement would be a defence to an action for the costs of preparing the lease. KAM

LEGAL NEWS.

It is rumoured that on the opening of the Viscount Bury will become chairman of committees, vice Lord Redesdale.

MR. MACNAMARA, one of the three commissioners who lately resigned their offices, is much better. He has withdrawn his resignation and will resume work.

arrangement with the counsel engaged in the case, Mr. P. H. Edlin, Q.C., Assistant Judge, on Saturday at the Guildhall, Westminster, to hear appeals, fixed Monday, the 29th for hearing the appeal against the judgment on Dr. Slade.

(Court Journal) hear that the Government the coming session of Parliament will bring in a Bill for the Better Management of Railways. It will be an earnest Bill, and go to the existing evils.

CHARLES CHABOT, the well-known expert dwtiting, whilst lately under examination probate action, was asked his reason for going to a stated conclusion, but he declined any. As he adhered to his determination, the Judge remarked that such evidence was of no use.

Household County Court the judge has committed to prison two trustees, one being clerk to the board and another a Dartmouth accountant not complying with orders to close the books. The action was taken at the instance of the Chief Controller in Bankruptcy, and the writ of the warrants was suspended to afford time for compliance.

DERICK W. WYBROO, clerk to Messrs. Mills, and Co., appeared to the adjourned trial before Mr. Vaughan, charging him with wilful and corrupt perjury in an affidavit sworn in Chancery.—M. Williams prosecuted George Lewis, jun., defended.—The case was of a suit in Chancery respecting an infringement of the patent rights of the roller skate, as the Plimpton skate, against Mr. Spiller, as the present complainant.—Lewis now in judgment in the previous case, and Mr. Spiller said he could not do otherwise than discontinue the summons, upon the ground that the affidavit was not material.

PATENT FLOATING.—The Scotsman reports a decision of the Court of Session upon an appeal out of circumstances connected with the opening of a mine in Canada. Mr. William Henderson, a chemical manufacturer, in Glasgow and in 1872 undertook, on behalf of the owners of the mine, to purchase the mines for £25,000. He formed such a company, of which he was one of the directors, and it appeared that only two of the gentlemen who subscribed in the prospectus were not bribed. The other had received £10,000; the other gentleman had returned what they received with interest, and an action brought by the company—Atkinson Copper and Sulphur Company—to recover the amount paid to Henderson, was decided by the Lord Ordinary Young in favour of the company. Against that Henderson appealed, on the ground that the payment was for personal skill and services. The Lord President and the judges were unanimous in dismissing the appeal. The defendant had accepted of a bribe to induce him to bring the company into existence, and to make himself director of the company. He accepted the £10,000 as the consideration on which he was to perform the office of director of the mines, and thus he placed himself in a position of having a trust duty to perform of having personal interest directly connected with that duty. The judgment, as the Lord President had pronounced it, was just to this gentleman to make over the money he received to the company, and in that judgment the Lordship entirely concurred.

EXTRAORDINARY ACTION.—On Tuesday at the Westminster County Court, before Baylis, judge, Mr. D'Ossay Atkins applied, on behalf of Mr. James E. Weir, for an injunction against Mr. Sanderson Corpe from playing in his chambers, which were under those of the defendant, who also sought to recover damages already incurred. Mr. Kemp appeared for the defendant. The plaintiff stated that he lived in the third floor of the house, 50, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and the defendant lived below him on the second floor. The plaintiff was in literary pursuits, and the playing upon the organ which was in defendant's chambers was of annoyance to him. On Aug. 22, when the organ was being taken into the chambers, he wrote to the defendant, stating that he would resist at law if necessary the use of such an instrument in chambers, and received a note informing him that the defendant would not object that the organ should be used so as to cause no nuisance. When the organ was tuned the plaintiff asked how long the operation would last, being informed two or three hours he went to bed. (Laughter.) The organ was played about twice or three times a week, and for three hours between seven and ten o'clock. On one occasion he stayed in while the playing was going on, but afterwards it so interfered with his sleep and work that so soon as defendant began playing he had to leave the room. The vibration was very great, causing something like a slight application of pressure. Plaintiff had occupied his chambers for four or five years, and had expended a considerable amount upon them, and therefore did not wish to leave. He was compelled to say the defendant played very badly—(laughter)—sometimes common airs such as "The Old Obadiah" and "Tommy, make room for your Uncle." (Laughter.) He should be obliged to leave his rooms if he did not obtain the injunction. Mr. John Fullilove, an artist, said that he occupied part of the plaintiff's chambers, and substantiated the statements previously made. Mr. Walter Flight deposed that he lived in chambers on the second floor of 51, Lincoln's-inn-fields. The vibration when the organ was played prevented him from continuing his work in his sitting-room, where he kept his books and papers. Mr. Sanderson Corpe, the defendant, said that he was a solicitor. The organ was made expressly for his rooms; it was a chamber organ, and was not nearly so powerful as a church organ. He had not experienced any vibration, although he had gone into other rooms while it was being played to test it. He played twice a week, and on one occasion when he had some friends in his room one of them played the airs mentioned. Mr. J. Saylard, solicitor, said he had chambers under those of the defendant. He did not find that the organ playing disturbed him at his work. It was proved that the defendant had the consent of his landlord in erecting the organ; that plaintiff was the only person who had complained before that day; and also he was the only one who slept in the house besides the defendant. His Honour said in his opinion this was not an actionable nuisance, although an intolerable one. Verdict was accordingly entered for the defendant with costs.

LEGAL OBITUARY.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Genealogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

T. LEWIN, ESQ.

THE late Thomas Lewin, Esq., F.S.A., barrister-at-law, of Lincoln's-inn, who died on the 5th inst., at his residence in Queen's Gate-place, in the seventy-second year of his age, was well known not only for his services to law, but also to literature. Born in the year 1804, he was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and afterwards at Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1828, and proceeded M.A. in due course. At the suggestion of Sir Edward Sugden (afterwards Lord St. Leonards) he chose the Bar as his profession, and was called at Lincoln's-inn in Hilary Term 1833. He enjoyed a fair share of practice as an equity draftsman; and when Lord St. Leonards carried out his reform in the Court of Chancery, Mr. Lewin was one of the six distinguished men whom his lordship selected as conveyancing counsel of the court. At the time of his death Mr. Lewin was the sole survivor of these counsel. The books by which Mr. Lewin will be known to the rising generation of lawyers and readers are his "Treatise on Trusts" and his "Life and Travels of St. Paul;" the former work has passed through several editions. Mr. Lewin was an enthusiast in whatever subject he took in hand: he twice visited the Holy Land in order to verify the statements contained in his work on St. Paul.

DR. GAYER, Q.C.

THE late Arthur Edward Gayer, Esq., Q.C., LL.D., who died on the 12th inst. at Abbotseigh, Upper Norwood, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, was the son of the late Major Edward Euhlin Gayer, of the 67th Regiment, by his marriage with Frances Christine, only daughter of the late Conway Richard Dobbs, Esq., of Castle Dobbs, county Antrim, and was born in 1801. He was educated first at a private school near Moneymore, county Londonderry, and afterwards at the Grammar Schools at Durham and Bath. In 1818 he entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he obtained honours in both science and classics, and received the degree of LL.D. in 1830. He was called to the Irish Bar in Trinity Term 1827, after studying in Lincoln's-inn, and was admitted an advocate in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts of Dublin in 1830. "Almost from the first," writes one who knew him well, "he began to make a mark for himself in his Profession, and in time became one of the leading members of the Chancery Bar, but it was as an ecclesiastical lawyer that he was most especially distinguished, and up to the time when the Ecclesiastical Courts in Dublin ceased to exist he held a brief there in almost every important case, and in the old Prerogative Court of Ireland he was generally considered to be facile princeps." In Nov. 1844, he was called within the Bar as one of Her Majesty's Counsel. He was appointed Chancellor and Vicar-General of the diocese of Ossory in 1848, of Meath in Jan. 1851, and of Cashel in June of the same year. In March 1857 he offered himself as a candidate for the representation of the University of Dublin, but was defeated. In 1859 he was appointed an Ecclesiastical Commissioner for Ireland, a post which he filled till Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church Act of 1869 deprived him of his duties. Dr. Gayer was for some years editor of a Protestant publication called the Catholic Layman, and on his retirement from that post he was presented with a handsome testimonial by his supporters. He was also the author of several pamphlets defending the Established Church of Ireland, &c. Dr. Gayer was twice married; first, to Eleanor Harriet, daughter of the Ven. John Whitby, late Archdeacon of Killfenora, and Rector of Ennistymon, co. Clare, by whom he leaves two sons and two daughters; and, secondly, to Frances, daughter of the late Edmund Molony, Esq., formerly of Calcutta, and by her, who survives him, he also leaves two sons and two daughters. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred at Woking Cemetery.

P. WRIGHT, ESQ.

THE late Peter Wright, Esq., solicitor, and clerk of the peace for Liverpool, who died on the 4th inst., at his residence, Hollin Hey, New Brighton, Cheshire, in the seventy-ninth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late William Wright, Esq., of Bankfield, Bolton, Lancashire, by his marriage with Catherine, daughter of Adam Fletcher, Esq. He was born at Crompton Fold, Lancashire, in the year 1798, and was articled to his uncle, Mr. Robert Greaves, of Liverpool, the founder of the firm of Messrs. Wright, Stockley, and Becket, of that town. In 1819 he was admitted a solicitor, and shortly afterwards became a commissioner to administer oaths in the various common law courts, a Master Extraordinary in Chancery, and, what was more profitable, a partner in his uncle's firm. In this position he enjoyed a good practice, and, taking an active interest in politics, he was for a long period an energetic and able supporter of the Conservative cause, in the days of Huskisson, Canning, Sir Howard Douglas, and others, holding a prominent position in the conduct of the municipal and parliamentary elections of the town. In the year 1844 he was appointed clerk of the peace for the borough of Liverpool, the duties of which office he conscientiously filled until his death. Besides holding numerous appointments of trust, he was treasurer of the West India Association—a position which he filled for over fifty years—and also treasurer of the New Brighton Convalescent Institution. Mr. Wright married, in 1824, Anne Jane, daughter of John Wright, Esq., merchant, of Liverpool, a descendant of his own ancestors, by whom he has left a family of four sons and two daughters. Two of his sons are members of the legal profession. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred in Flaybrick Hill Cemetery, Birkenhead.

G. MATCHAM, ESQ., LL.D.

THE late George Matcham, Esq., LL.D., of Newhouse, Wiltshire, and Headlands, Sussex, formerly an advocate in Doctors' Commons, who died on the 18th inst., in the eighty-eighth year of his age, was the eldest son of the late George Matcham, Esq., of Ashfold Lodge, Sussex, by his marriage with Catharine, daughter of the late Rev. Edmund Nelson, rector of Burnham Thorpe, Norfolk, and sister of Admiral Lord Nelson. He was born in the year 1789, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took the degrees of LL.B. in 1814, and LL.D. in 1820; and in the latter year he was admitted an advocate in Doctors' Commons. He was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Wiltshire, and for many years chairman of quarter sessions for that county, from which post he had lately retired. Dr. Matcham married, in 1817, Harriet, daughter and heiress of the late William Eyre, Esq., of Newhouse, and by her, who died in 1873, he has left a family. His eldest son, Mr. William Eyre Matcham, now of Newhouse, married Mary Elizabeth, daughter of the late Henry Lawes Long, Esq., of Hampton Lodge, Surrey. The deceased gentleman and his male issue are in remainder to the earldom of Nelson.

consent, to extend the reasons for allowing a postponement to electioneering considerations is decidedly objectionable. If adopted to any extent, parties in other causes in the list might be put to serious inconvenience, and if not adopted generally, it should not be adopted at all.

We are glad to hear that the case of Ex parte Attwater, re Turner, which we recently criticised, is going to the House of Lords. Our readers will remember that it decided that an unregistered bill of sale holder taking possession before the filing of the grantor's petition for liquidation is nevertheless liable to lose the benefit of his security if within twelvemonths of the petition the grantor has committed a secret act of bankruptcy.

The Common Pleas Division has issued an important notice to the effect that motions by way of appeal from Inferior Courts shall be made only on days fixed for hearing such appeals, and that no motion shall be made by way of appeal from a County Court unless a copy of the Judge's notes signed by the Judge shall have been handed to the proper officer in court unless otherwise ordered.

In a recent number we published a letter exposing the absurd laxity prevailing in the supervision of candidates at the Bar examinations. Books and manuscripts are taken into the examination room by candidates, and "cribbing" is carried on in the boldest manner. The only persons present as attendants are a couple of servants, who of course know nothing about what is going on. At no other examination are candidates left absolutely uncontrolled by examiners, and for the credit of the Inns of Court, which have done much to raise the standard of knowledge, we trust that this evil will not go unremedied.

MR. DANIEL, Q.C. tells us that measures have been prepared which will be brought before Parliament for the purpose of centralising County Court work in important places, and extending the jurisdiction absolutely. The view that the business which is now blocking the Superior Courts in the metropolis must sooner or later be scattered is being put forward, and there will be nothing to be said against it unless ritual appeals to the Privy Council are tried with less expenditure of judicial power and more Judges are appointed. One fact, however, seems to be overlooked, and that is that the business in the High Court of Justice is now all of a bona fide character. There are no undefended cases, and the Legislature will have to think seriously before it gives to the existing County Courts unlimited jurisdiction. It is satisfactory to learn that Parliament will soon be called upon to consider the condition of legal business.

A VERY important question of costs has been decided by the Common Pleas Division, namely, that a verdict for a farthing will carry costs if no order is made by the Judge depriving the plaintiff of his costs. The action to which we refer was one of libel, and before the Judicature Act the plaintiff would have got no costs. Under that Act it is necessary that the Judge should make an order, otherwise costs follow the event. This is a matter which must be borne steadily in mind at Nisi Prius. Since the decision was given it has been intimated by the court that it was not intended to decide that any part of the 55th Order of the Judicature Acts was to be read as otherwise than governed by the words "subject to the provisions of this Act." Mention had been made during the argument of the 67th section of the Act of 1873, and the court intimated that in their opinion each part of Order LV. must be read subject to the provisions of section 67 of the Act of 1873, as well as subject to every other provision in the Acts referring to the same subject-matter.

GENERALLY, in case of conflict between the rules of Equity and the rules of Common Law, the former shall prevail. That is the effect of a well-known sub-section of the Judicature Act 1873, which is, indeed, a little cloud like a man's hand, but is rapidly becoming of large dimensions. Not a week ago LORD COLERIDGE said that he considered the word "rules" to mean "doctrines," and not "rules of practice;" this week he has said, upon the authority of a decision of the Court of Appeal, that it means the latter, no doubt, as well as the former. In Schroder v. Clough, where the question was the date from which interest on costs was to run, the little sub-section had the effect of overturning two considered judgments of Courts of Common Law. Interest upon costs is to run from the date of the Taxing Master's certificate—according to the old rule of the Court of Chancery; and not from the date of signing judgment—which was the Common Law rule, founded upon the two decisions. Again, in Parsons v. Tinsling, a construction was put upon Order LV., partly by the help of the same little sub-section, which upsets a series of statutes beginning with the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. 1, c. 1), and going on through the reigns of the Tudors and Stuarts, down to LORD DENMAN's Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 24). Costs are to be in the absolute years 1873-76 seventy-eight judicial decisions were disapproved of, overruled, or reversed.

t of Appeal has established a dangerous precedent; it ed a cause to be postponed because the leading counsel le was engaged in his personal affairs as a Member of al. The unavoidable absence of counsel on public or al business is a matter for consideration; but, even with discretion of the Judge—according to the old rule in Chancery—except where the parties are trustees, or otherwise uninterested; and except where, in a case tried with a jury, no application is made to the judge at the time, or to the Court afterwards, showing good cause why the costs should not follow the substantial result of the trial.

It would be interesting to receive at the hands of the various individuals who write to the Times on the question of the Law's delay the names of the barristers whom they respectively consider eligible for judgeships. On the one hand it is stated that more judges are not appointed because it is difficult to find good men. On the other "An Old Practitioner" says, "I could venture to nominate 100 Chancery barristers and 100 Common Law barristers all of whom would make excellent judges." This would be quite invigorating if we could only persuade ourselves that this is anything more than a random estimate. It is really impossible to say who will make a good judge, but we agree with an "Old Practitioner" that the best material is to be found amongst the men who are still young. These men, however, are not as a rule inclined to accept £5000 a year, and if the best men are to be appointed judicial salaries must be raised to at least £7000.

It is difficult to feel any sympathy with the remark of Sir GEORGE JESSEL that the Judges of the Chancery Division would have less to do if none but causes "assigned" to the Chancery Division were entered there. We do not understand that the assignment of particular matters to the Chancery Division was intended even by implication to preclude suitors from entering any kind of action in that division. The intention, of course, was to provide that matters hitherto peculiar to Chancery should be confined to the Chancery Division. An elementary blunder is made in talking of Chancery actions and Common Law actions. Every proceeding is now an action, and it is to be regretted that the Judges cannot get rid of distinctions and deal boldly and uncomplainingly with the matters brought before them. One step towards bringing home to the Judges at Westminster the fact that they must sit alone would be the removal of unnecessary seats on the bench. If permanent arrangements were made for a single Judge in each division, the change would become apparent to the eye as well as present to the imagination. Judges, like ordinary mortals, are creatures of association.

It is a misfortune of no mean order when the forms of law and the process of the courts afford the means of delaying if not defeating justice. The history of the prosecution of Mr. ALLEY JONES, a solicitor, by a client, an elderly lady, reflects some discredit on our legal procedure. The charge against Mr. JONES is that he stripped this lady of all she possessed by means of false pretences, and exposed her to considerable liabilities which she is unable to meet. His trial was fixed to come off some time since, before Mr. Commissioner KERR. A learned criminal counsel was instructed to defend, but failed to appear. Time was granted to instruct other counsel, who when instructed asked for time to get up the case. Time was granted and was utilised by making an application at Chambers for a certiorari to remove the case into Middlesex for trial by a special jury. The application was refused by Mr. Justice LUSH. Mr. JONES appealed to the court retaining the SOLICITOR-GENERAL to support the appeal, which eventually proved successful, and the case goes to the bottom of the list of cases now standing for trial in Middlesex, and will probably not be reached before midsummer. If Mr. JONES is innocent it is hard to understand how he can endure having such a charge hanging over him when it might have been expeditiously disposed of.

In another column we report a case decided by the Liverpool County Court with respect to the appointment of receivers in bankruptcy, and it is somewhat surprising that the question has not previously been authoritatively determined. Mr. Registrar MURRAY, early in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, ruled that he did not think it was within the spirit of the Act of Parliament that a receiver appointed by the Court, should be displaced without any sufficient reason being shown; and Mr. ROBSON, in a foot note to his treatise on the Bankruptcy Act, states that it is not the practice, in the London Court, to remove a receiver appointed by the Court, and appoint the nominee of the creditors, except under special circumstances. Notwithstanding these dicta, the courts, exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction in the country districts, have never hesitated to remove their own receivers in favour of those of the creditors. The spirit of the Act, no doubt, is to make the wishes of the creditors paramount in bankruptcy affairs; but we fail to see why the bankruptcy rules should be made subservient to that end by being construed adversely to their literal meaning. If they are to be directory—and the object of all rules ought to be simply to define the procedure to be adopted in administering the Act under which they are framed—we cannot understand why the administrators of the Act should invoke, in construing the rules, the object of the Legislature, and thereby neutralize one portion of a rule to effect to another and inconsistent part of the same rule. In the case to which we refer, the court appointed a receiver, obtained a restraining order against an execution creditor, personally undertook to be answerable in any damages the creditor might suffer by being restrained. A majority in favour of creditors immediately afterwards nominated another receiver, and the appointment of the court was asked to confirm in the stead of its nominee. Mr. PERRONETT THOMPSON, one of the Judges of Liverpool County Court, on the circumstances of the case brought before him, after considering the question, decided neither in the statute nor rules did he discover any power given to creditors to appoint a receiver where one had already been appointed by the court, and he did not consider that he ought to give effect to that portion of Rule 262 which speaks of a receiver for whose creation or legal existence no provision had been made. With these views of the learned Judge we entirely concur. The alleged object of the Legislature, unless clearly defined, ought not to be imported where it nullifies the plain terms of rules made by the language of the Act, are to have the same force as if they were enacted in the body of the Act. The question, we think, is to be appealed to the Chief Judge, and therefore we refrain from further comment until it has been ventilated before his Lord

In a recent betting case (Higginson v. Simpson), an attempt was made, under cover of a very thin disguise, to break through the Gaming Act 1845, which enacts that all contracts by way of wagering shall be void, and that no suit shall be maintained for recovering money won upon any wager. Upon this statute has been held that no action between the parties to a wager will lie to recover money so lost, or between one of the parties and a stakeholder, after the event on which the wager laid has come off. Notwithstanding those well known principles a professional betting man laid the following wager, and attempted to recover upon it in the Court of Passage at Liverpool. He agreed with the defendant to lay out £2 in backing Regal in the Grand National Steeplechase, by taking odds from the defendant at 25 to 1 against the horse, the defendant to pay out of his winnings in another quarter upon the same horse—in effect, the plaintiff stipulated that the defendant should lay him £50 against Regal—in consideration of the information that Regal was a probable winner. Here was an unmistakable wager; and the plaintiff, the very man who made it, brought an action upon the other party to the wager to recover upon it. We should have thought that the law upon betting, so far as it is stated at the beginning of this paragraph, was pretty well known at the present day. But the statute has been worn so thin by the decisions upon it, that perhaps, after all, it is not so very extraordinary that an attempt was made to reduce it still further.

The 94th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, enacts that any contract or dealing with a bankrupt, made in good faith and for valuable consideration, before the date of the order of adjudication by a person not having at the time of making such contract or dealing, notice of any act of bankruptcy, committed by the bankrupt, and available against him for adjudication, shall be valid. The application of this provision has given much trouble to the practitioners in bankruptcy. In the recent case of Re Dickin; Re Waugh (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769), Waugh came to build some house for a building club, and agreed that if he became bankrupt or insolvent or otherwise be rendered incapable of completing the contract, the architect should have power, by giving two days' notice in writing to Waugh, to appoint other persons to complete the contract, and also "to seize and remove materials, plant, and implements upon the ground," provided Waugh had received money on account of the contract. The architect gave Waugh the notice on May 30th 1874, and warned him not to remove the materials and plant. Waugh, however, later filed a petition of liquidation on the same day. The architect took possession on the 2nd June, without notice of the order of bankruptcy. The Judge of the County Court, held at Liverpool upon the application of the architect, granted an injunction restraining the trustee from removing, or in any way interfering with the materials, implements, and plant upon the works. This decision was upheld by the Chief Judge, on the ground that the effect of the proviso was to give the club an equitable lien on the property, and that the seizure before notice of the act of bankruptcy, the transaction was within the protection of the 94th section. It was contended on the authority of Ex parte J. & Co. (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108), that a proviso to seize upon bankruptcy or insolvency was an unlawful contract. But this we are not concerned at present. The point for consideration is this, was the seizure, assuming the license to be valid, a protected transaction? The Chief Judge, in giving the words used by Baron MARTIN in another case, observed that "the transaction ought not to be confirmed as an act of entering to seize the goods." It includes the whole arrangement between the parties, from the time of entering contract downwards. "Well, then," said the Chief Judge, "under those circumstances, this fact being clear that very early after the filing of the petition, the society put in force a contract, which was dated in 1874, and that they had a right to do so is not questioned at all." The question here raised is of a comparatively simple character. Cases arise from time to time which are far more complex. Thus, when the result of an unregistered bill of sale seizes in good faith and without notice the property comprised in the bill, the mortgagor has committed a secret act of bankruptcy a short time afterwards, it may be asked whether such a transaction is prohibited as against the trustee in bankruptcy. A somewhat similar question will, we believe, be shortly brought on appeal for the consideration of the House of Lords, the Court of Appeal having decided that the title of the trustee related back to the secret act of bankruptcy. Here, it will be observed, new circumstances are introduced, such as the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act. All will wait with some interest to learn in what way the Act is controlled by, or qualifies as the case may be, the existing clauses in the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

NOISY NUISANCES.

The learned Judge of the Westminster County Court, a few days ago gave a decision which, with all deference, we think was erroneous in point of law. A Mr. James Redding Ware, a very gentleman, occupying chambers in Lincoln's-inn-fields, sued for an injunction against a Mr. Corpe, to restrain the defendant from doing an act which was alleged to be a nuisance. The plaintiff, it appears, occupied chambers on the third floor on which he had expended a considerable sum of money, and taken to them in a dilapidated condition. The defendant, occupied chambers in the second floor directly under those of the plaintiff, bought last summer an organ, which was forthwith carried to his premises. The approximate dimensions of the organ, which occupied half of the room, were stated to be 10ft. high, 10ft. wide, and 4ft. or 5ft. deep. The plaintiff, not usually, protested strongly against the introduction of such an instrument into such a place, but to no purpose; the reply was that it made less noise than a piano, and that no nuisance to anyone would be caused by the playing. We will quote the plaintiff's words as to the reasons on which he based his application for relief. "The organ," he said, "had been played at different times since (i.e., last summer), about two or three times a week; and for about three hours, during which it was being played, and found that it so interfered with his comfort and the performance of his work that whenever it commenced he had to leave the house. It was usually played from seven o'clock until nine o'clock in the evening, and the vibration was very great, and an effect very like that produced by a single application of a hammer. On the first day it was played a Dresden plate in the room was thrown down; the vibration communicated itself to the articles in his room, composed of china, glass, or metal. . . . The music was very bad, and very common airs were played." Evidence given by the plaintiff was corroborated by other persons who occupied other adjoining chambers, one of whom stated that he was quite incapacitated from doing his work in his room, where his books and papers were, during the time the organ was being played. Some contradictory testimony was given on the other side, with the view of showing that no such nuisance as was alleged by the plaintiff did in fact exist. The County Court judge, however, considered the nuisance was an actionable one, but gave judgment in favour of the defendant, on the ground that it was not such a nuisance as formed the gist of an action.

"Nuisance," says Blackstone, "is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage;" but many acts which may properly come under the above definition would not be the subject of an action. In other words, there are nuisances and legal nuisances. The principle which the rule of law proceeds is "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." But it must not be inferred that an action can be maintained for a thing done merely to the inconvenience of another—mere inconvenience or annoyance do not always constitute a legal nuisance. If the authorities on the subject come to be examined, the real test, we apprehend, is this: Is the act complained of such as a man might reasonably commit in the exercise of his rights having regard to all the circumstances of the case? To use the words of Vice-Chancellor Bruce in Walter v. Selfe (10 Q. B. 315), "Will the proceedings abridge and diminish the ordinary comforts of existence of the occupiers whatever their rank or station, or whatever their state of health may be?" (See also Crumph v. Lambert, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 409.) If so, the act is actionable. A reasonable use of a man's property is in right to be permitted; but if a person puts his premises to unusual purposes, so as to cause his neighbour a substantial nuisance, the latter is entitled to be protected, because that is not a lawful use of his property. (See the remarks of Lord Selborne, when Lord Chancellor, in Ball v. Ray, L. Rep. 8 Ch. App.) A man's occupation of his house may be rendered materially uncomfortable, and yet the act complained of, e.g., the noise of a neighbour's children in a nursery, may not be the subject of redress;

because, as Lord Justice Mellish said in Ball v. Ray, "the noise is such as he must reasonably expect." Acting on this principle, Vice-Chancellor Bacon decided in Harrison v. Good (40 L. J. 294, Ch.) that the establishment of a national school, however much it might injure and depreciate the adjoining neighbourhood, was not an actionable nuisance. The mere fact of the depreciation of the adjoining property could not establish a nuisance, for, as the Vice-Chancellor truly observed, "in common parlance nuisance is no doubt applied to a great many things wholly different from, and others not at all like, the definition which by law is given to the word." Cases of nuisances from offensive smells, and the exercise of noisome trades, have always been determined on similar considerations, and the question has always been whether the business or trade which causes the annoyance is carried on in a reasonable manner, and in a reasonable and proper place. There is a reported case tried before Lord Kenyon (Street v. Tugwell, Selw. N. P., 13th edit., 1070), which may seem to conflict with these remarks but does not really do so. There an action was brought against the defendant for keeping dogs so near the plaintiff's dwelling-house that he was disturbed in the enjoyment thereof. It appeared that the defendant kept six or seven pointers so near the plaintiff's dwelling-house that his family were disturbed during the night, and were very much disturbed in the daytime. No evidence was given by the defendant, notwithstanding which the jury found a verdict for him, and a new trial was afterwards refused. It should be borne in mind, however, that the question of reasonableness is for the jury, and the court would doubtless have upheld the verdict had it been found the other way.

Now, applying the legal test to the case heard at the Westminster County Court, did the defendant, under the circumstances, exercise a reasonable user of his chambers in erecting an organ of the dimensions we have mentioned? There can, we think, be no doubt how this inquiry should be answered; indeed, the learned County Court Judge has found as a fact that the act complained of is an intolerable nuisance, though he has, notwithstanding this, held such an act not to be an actionable one.

We regret that the defendant has expressed his intention to accept the decision of the County Court Judge as final.

ALTERATIONS IN CHEQUES.

We are informed that there exists among bankers a notion widely prevalent and acted on without much or any hesitation, which comes as a surprise upon us, and which also, we think, will surprise many of their customers. As our readers know, it is the practice of banks to supply their customers with printed forms of cheques in which the words "bearer" or "order" are printed as part of the form. The introduction of the printed forms for payment to "order" is of somewhat recent date, and we fancy that the rise of the notion to which we are about to call attention is, in some degree, attributable to the custom of issuing these printed "order" forms instead of the older and general forms for payment to "bearer." The notion of the banks is that if the drawer of a cheque uses a printed form for payment to "bearer," and the cheque when presented shows a cancellation of the word "bearer" and a substitution, by interlineation or otherwise, of the word "order" (such alteration not being authenticated by the signature or initials of the drawer) that the bankers in such case are at liberty to pay the amount of the cheque to any bearer of it, without regard to the payee specially named, and without requiring his indorsement—in fact, to ignore the alteration altogether, and to act on the cheque in its unaltered form, and to do this whether the cheque was or was not altered by or with the consent of the drawer, and whether the alteration was previous or subsequent to the issuing of the cheque.

Considering the numbers of cheques which are altered from "bearer" cheques to "order" cheques by the uninitialled alteration of the drawer, it is of importance, both to bankers and customers, to understand whether this notion of the bankers is well founded. If the bankers be right in their contention, a debtor who is authorised by his creditor to remit the amount of the debt by cheque payable to the creditor's order, would clearly have to pay the money over again should he remit by a cheque altered from "bearer" to "order" but uninitialled, and the bankers should pay someone else without such "order" or indorsement.

We entertain a strong opinion, however, that the bankers in this instance are entirely in the wrong. The cancellation of the word "bearer" with the substitution of the word "order," is no doubt a material alteration, and it lies upon the holder to show when, by whom, and under what circumstances, the alteration was made. Until the bankers are satisfied that the alteration was made by the drawer, or with his consent, they are justified in withholding payment; even if so satisfied they may further, strictissimi juris, having regard to the provisions of the Stamp Acts, require to be satisfied that the alteration was before the issuing, so as not to call for an additional stamp, since the provisions of the Stamp Act 1870, sect. 54, sub-sect. 2, as to adhesive stamps for a bill of exchange (which, by sect. 48, includes a cheque), for the payment of money on demand liable only to duty of one penny, appear to be permissive, and not obligatory on the drawee. The drawee may, if he pleases, procure and affix and cancel the adhesive stamps, and if he chooses to pay, must do so, but he is, as we imagine, entitled to say that the draft is an imperfect one, and that the drawer or holder must, if he wants his money, present a properly stamped instrument. Such we conceive to be the strict right of the bankers in such a case. To that extent a banker could properly say that he was not bound to recognise an alteration not satisfactorily accounted for. It is quite another thing for him to say that he shall act on the cheque by complying with what he assumes to have been its form when issued, or to say that he shall ignore the actual state of the cheque at the time of presentation, and shall not even take notice or inquire whether at that time it is or is not from its appearance and the alterations in it prima facie an invalid instrument. A banker is certainly not liable to his customer for refusing to honour a cheque presented in such a condition. As a negotiable instrument it is, until the alterations or other suspicious marks on it are explained—the onus of explanation being on the holder—to be regarded as an invalid instrument, and that, whether the alteration operate or not for the benefit of the drawer or maker: (see Gardener v. Walsh, 5 El. & Bl. 83) and on the subject generally Master v. Miller, 1 Smith L. Cases 1871, and notes thereto, 7th edit.).

As at present advised, we hold that a banker who pays to bearer without the authority of the payee specially named, or, to speak more correctly, without requiring an indorsement purporting to be his signature, and the genuineness of which the banker has no sufficient reason to doubt (see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, s. 19), a cheque which on the face of it, at the time of presentation, is a cheque payable to a special payee or his order, could not possibly be permitted to charge the drawer with such payment, on the plea that the word "order" had been substituted by an uninitialled alteration for bearer, if, in fact, such alteration was made by or with the consent of the drawer.

A banker's strict right, and perhaps his only safe course in such a case, is to refuse payment until satisfied that the alteration was made by or with the drawer's consent; for it would, we suppose, be competent for the drawer to contend that an alteration otherwise, if material, operated in law as an absolute revocation of his mandate to the banker. This view is supported by the very recent case of Vance v. Lowther, in the Exchequer Division (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236), where it was held that the transferee, for value of a cheque, the date of which had, without the knowledge of the transferee, been altered from the 2nd to the 26th of the month without the authority of the drawer, could maintain no action on the cheque, the same having in point of law been altogether invalidated by the unauthorised alteration. The decision is valuable as shewing that our judges are determined to discourage any tampering with written engagements, to uphold mercantile instruments in their integrity—to consider the question of materiality of an alteration with respect to the contract itself, and not by looking at the surrounding circumstances of the particular case—and to treat every alteration which changes the legal obligation and character of the instrument as material. Practically, however, bankers as a matter of policy, do not take technical objections to their customers' cheques, and would generally and perhaps reasonably disregard the possibility to which we have adverted, rather than offend their customers. At the same time we think they would act most unwisely if they did not insist that the indorsement of the payee specially named should be placed on the cheque as a condition precedent to the payment of it in the circumstances which we have been particularly considering.

AGENCY.—THE DOCTRINE OF ELECTION. (a)

WHEN one of the parties to a contract is an agent, it frequently becomes of importance to determine whether the party with whom he contracts, has, by anything he has done, become deprived of his right to elect to sue either the agent or his principal, assuming that such a right existed after the contract was entered into.

When the agent contracts in his own name, disclosing his principal at the same time, either the principal or the agent may be sued upon the contract; but the defendant may show that his liability was put an end to by the plaintiff's election to sue the other party. This, according to Mr. Justice Willes (in Calder v. Dobell, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 494), was what was meant by Lord Tenterden, when he said (in Thomson v. Davenport, 9 B. & C. 78), that "if, at the time of the sale, the seller know not only that the person who is nominally dealing with him is not principal but agent, and also know who the principal really is, and, notwithstanding all that knowledge, chooses to make the agent his debtor, dealing with him alone, then (according to Addison v. Gandasequi 4 Taunt 574; or Paterson v. Gandasequi 15 East, 62) the seller cannot afterwards, on failure of the agent, turn round and charge the principal, having once made his election at the time when he had the power of choosing between the one and the other." The question of election or no election is one of fact, and it is properly left to a jury to say whether the circumstances of a case negative or exclude liability of principal or agent, or substitute the liability of the one for that of the other (Calder v. Dobell, sup.) Hence it follows that up to the moment of election, two persons, principal and agent, may be severally liable upon the same contract (see Id. per Mr. Justice Willes). The fact that the agent mentions the name of the principal at the time the contract is made, or that the contract is on its face entered into in the name of the agent, or that payment due under the contract is demanded of the latter, does not make any difference in the liability of the parties. As to the last circumstance, Chief Justice Bovill (ib.) remarked that it was an equivocal act, and clearly matter for the jury. The effect of the cases is that a seller may make his election whenever the principal is discovered, and the only difference in principle between the case when the principal is disclosed, and where he is not disclosed, is that in the former case, the election may be made at the very time the contract is made (per Mr. Justice M. Smith, ib.).

It is clear, therefore, that questions of some degree of difficulty may be raised with reference to the evidence which is insufficient to show that a party contracting with an agent has elected which he will hold liable, the principal or the agent. In the absence of any alteration of the account to the prejudice of the principal (Armstrong v. Stokes, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 598), it is well established that one contracting party, on discovering that the other contracting party was merely an agent for an undisclosed principal, has a right, within a reasonable time (Smethurst v. Mitchell, 1 E. & E. 622; 28 L. J. 241, Q. B.), to elect to proceed against the principal (Thomson v. Davenport, 9 B. & C. 78, 86), unless in the meantime with full knowledge as to who was the principal, and with the power of choosing between him and the agent (Addison v. Gandasequi, 4 Taunt. 574, and Paterson v. Gandasequi, 15 East, 62), he had elected to treat the agent alone as his debtor. Until this election is made, either the principal or agent may be liable upon the contract. Here it becomes of importance to determine what act or conduct amounts to an election. In general, the question of election can only be properly dealt with as a question of fact for the jury, subject to the direction of the presiding Judge: (see Calder v. Dobell (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 486, and observations of the court in Curtis v. Williamson, L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 59.) Conclusive evidence of such an election is afforded by an action which has been proceeded with to judgment and execution even without satisfaction.

In Priestley v. Fernie (3 H. & C. 977; 34 L. J. 172, Ex.), decided in 1865, an action had been brought against the captain of a ship for the non-delivery of goods pursuant to a bill of lading. The plaintiff recovered judgment. A ca. sa. was issued upon the judgment; the captain was arrested, and detained until he was made a bankrupt. The plaintiff then brought an action against the shipowner (the principal) for the same breach upon the bill of lading. By way of defence to this action was set up the previous proceedings against the captain. They were relied on as a conclusive election in point of law to hold the captain alone responsible, and to discharge the shipowner. The court held that the second action did not lie. It is a matter of inference, from the language used in the judgment in Priestley v. Fernie, that in order to afford conclusive evidence of an election, the action against the agent should be proceeded with to judgment; but whether the judgment was satisfied the court thought immaterial. "If this," said Baron Bramwell, who delivered the judgment of the Court, "were an ordinary case of principal and agent, where the agent, having made a contract in his own name, has been sued on it to judgment; there can be no doubt that a second action would be maintainable against the principal." By an election to sue was meant an election to "sue to judgment." The reason given being that an action against one might be discontinued, and fresh proceedings be well taken against the other.

The question whether the first action should be proceeded with to judgment to afford conclusive evidence of an election, was again raised in 1874 in Curtis v. Williamson (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 57) in which case the Court held that the mere fact of filing an affidavit of proof against the estate of an insolvent agent of an undisclosed principal, after that undisclosed principal is known to the creditor, is not a conclusive election by the creditor to treat the agent as his debtor. The decision in Priestley v. Fernie was approved of, but, owing to the different facts, did not supply the ratio decidendi. Here the action was commenced against the agent, and the affidavit in bankruptcy had been made without any intention whatever to discharge the present defendants from responsibility. The court was therefore of opinion that it would be going much too far to hold that this was in point of law a binding election, though it might constitute, with other facts, some evidence of election to be submitted to a jury.

The judgment in Priestley v. Fernie brings out clearly another important point with respect to the liability of undisclosed principal and agent, and that is that the right to sue, i.e., to sue to judgment, is in the alternative. "The very expression that where a contract is so made," said Baron Amphlett, "the contractor has an election to sue agent or principal, supposes he can only sue one of them, that is to say, sue to judgment." Then, turning to the other contention, his Lordship points out that there is no authority for its support, but that there is one strong argument to the contrary, viz., that if a shipmaster (or agent) contracts under seal no action lies on the contract against the owners. Now if the master (or agent) made two contracts, one for himself and one for his owners (the principals), his contract would not prevent the owners being sued on the other contract.

The mere insertion of the agent's name in a written contract, the principal's name being known at the time, is not conclusive evidence of an election on the part of the other contracting party to look to the agent only. In Calder v. Dobell (sup.), decided in 1871, a broker was authorised by the defendant to buy cotton for him, but not to disclose his name. As the broker's credit was not good enough to obtain a contract upon his own sole responsibility, he gave the plaintiffs the name of his principal, the defendant. In the bought and sold notes the broker was named as the buyer. The broker sent to the defendant an advice note, informing him that the cotton was bought of the plaintiff for him. The defendant did not repudiate the contract. The invoice was made out to the broker, but as the plaintiffs failed to obtain payment of C., they sued the defendant. At the trial, Mr. Justice Brett put the following questions to the jury:—1. Did the defendant authorise the broker to make the contract for him? 2. Did the broker assume to make the contract for the defendant, and did the defendant, knowing this, ratify his act? 3. Did the plaintiffs knowing that the broker was acting as agent for the defendant elect to contract with the broker as principal, upon the terms of giving credit to him alone. The jury found the first and second questions in the affirmative; the third in the negative. A rule to enter a verdict for the defendant, or a nonsuit, or for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection, was refused by the full court, whose decision was upheld in the Exchequer Chamber.

The following rules may be deduced from the authorities with certainty:

- (1.) Both principal and agent may be liable to the other contracting party in the alternative.
- (2.) This alternative liability continues until the other contracting party elects to accept one of the two, the principal or the agent as his debtor.
- (3.) Whether there has been such an election is a question for the jury, as a general rule.
- (4.) But where the third party has sued the principal or agent to judgment, it is a conclusion of law that he has made his election: (See Calder v. Dobell, sup.)
- (5.) In considering whether there has been a conclusive election or not it is immaterial whether the acts which are said to show an election have or have not been fruitless: (Priestley v. Fernie, sup.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

Pressure on our space necessitates our holding over much matter connected with this Department.

In our last number we said enough to show how miserably insufficient is the system which at present obtains in regard to making out and publishing the Common Law Cause Lists for Westminster and the City of London. Two minor points, however, connected therewith are since brought to our notice. Whenever a cause is likely to be in the paper it is usual, of course, to attend at the Associates' Office, in Chancery-lane, to search the lists in order to see what cases are in the paper for the following day. To what extent is the convenience of solicitors and their common law clerks consulted in this matter? Thus, one single list for the common law divisions is posted up in a narrow passage leading to the Associates' Office, in Chancery-lane. The passage is about 3 yds. long and 1 yd. broad. The list is posted up on one side of this passage, and about five o'clock, during the sittings, this passage is every evening crowded with common law clerks, who have to push and struggle to get near enough to the list to see what cases are in the paper for the next day. Instead of this passage, a room is necessary; and instead of one list, at least half a dozen should be posted up. Then as to part heard cases, a plan is adopted as regards Common Pleas cases which is most misleading, namely, the system by which when a case is part heard, and stands first for disposal the next day, all mention of such part heard case is omitted from the cause list of the next day's business. For instance, suppose on a Thursday Smith v. Jones is only part heard when the court sits on that day, the paper for the Common Pleas issued on the Thursday evening, showing the cases in the paper for the Friday, will omit all mention of Smith v. Jones as part heard, and will place as first on the list the next case, say Jones v. Robinson. As a natural consequence it often happens that witnesses and others concerned in the case which stands next after the part heard case attend early at Westminster, only to find that there is a part heard case before them, which occupies say half the day. It is absolutely necessary for the convenience of the Profession that part heard cases should be noticed in the Common Pleas list, as is always done in the two other common law divisions.

In our last issue, page 222, we gave full particulars of the difficulties which a luckless plaintiff, in an action in the High Court of Justice, at Westminster, had to encounter before he got to trial; discouraging as the facts there set out must have been to the plaintiff, his troubles did not end there. We are favoured with the following additional information in connection with the action by the plaintiff's solicitor. The case came on about 1.30 p.m. on a Saturday, and the court rose at 2 o'clock p.m. On the previous day the clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitor was informed that the plaintiff's leader had handed the brief over to a Q.C. unknown to the solicitor, because the Q.C. originally instructed had a case in another court. The plaintiff, acting under his solicitor's advice, demanded that his brief should be obtained from the second Q.C., and a copy handed to a certain other Q.C., with a larger fee than was marked on the original brief, and it was after a consultation (being the third in the case in which one was sufficient) on the Friday evening, that the case came before the court on the next day. The case stood third on the list for the Monday as a part-heard case, and the parties and many witnesses attended accordingly. The suitors of course expected, however, that the case would be first in the list. The two cases inserted before it—contrary to all rule—were merely cases in which the learned judge intended to deliver judgment. This he proceeded to do, but his professional attire suggested that he contemplated sitting in banco, and so it turned out, for having delivered his judgments in the two cases he proceeded to another court, and the part-heard case was not called on at all, and the jury were dismissed till the next day, when the case was disposed of. Our correspondent asks us to add that his client, although entirely successful, assured him that he would never again go to trial with an action if he could avoid it, owing chiefly to the long delay and the anxiety he had experienced by the uncertainties attending the trial when once the case came before the court. What, then, must be the feelings of the unsuccessful party? Comment on the facts of this case, as set out by us, is needless. The state of things it discloses is intolerable, and cannot continue. It is the fault of a system which is in no way suited to present requirements.

A CORRESPONDENT writes as follows upon the subject of unauthorised persons practising as solicitors:—"A person in this town, formerly a solicitor's clerk, but now calling himself an accountant, appears to be doing considerable legal business, which the solicitors of the town are desirous of checking. We have no case of his drawing deeds and charging for them, but we can prove that he drew an award under an arbitration; no special sum is set out as his fee in the award, but a general charge of £5 5s. is made for the arbitration. One of the arbitrators told me that the costs of the award were included in this, but would not tell me how much it was. The questions which arise on this are: first, Does an award come within the terms of the Stamp Act 1870, sect. 60? secondly, as a general rule an arbitrator cannot be required to show how his award is made out; can he be required (in the witness box) to disclose the fee he paid for drawing the same? thirdly, who is entitled to the penalty, and how may it be recovered?" It is difficult to suppose that an award is not an "instrument relating to real or personal estate," within the meaning of sect. 60 of the Stamp Act, although the Solicitor of the Inland Revenue Commissioners has expressed the opinion that an abstract of title deeds of real estate is not an instrument within the Act. No doubt the arbitrator would have to answer the question suggested, in case of proceedings under the Stamp Act to recover the penalty of £50. The third inquiry is sufficiently answered by a reference to sect. 26 of the Stamp Act 1870, and it is to this provision that we especially refer our correspondent, who should at once place himself in communication with the Inland Revenue Commissioners. The better opinion seems to be that neither the Solicitors' Acts nor the Legal Practitioners' Act apply to a case of this sort. The case of the Attorney General v. Tett, reported in the LAW TIMES of 28th Nov. last, deserves attention; in that case the jury returned a verdict for the Crown for £50, being the full penalty under the Stamp Act, for preparing a bill of sale contrary to that enactment.

WE are glad to learn that Mr. Joseph Mason Moore, of South Shields, Solicitor of the Supreme Court, has been appointed by the Lord High Chancellor a justice of the peace for the borough of Jarrow. Mr. Moore is town clerk of South Shields and clerk to the justices for the East Division of Chester Ward, in the county of Durham. It is gratifying to notice how rapidly the prejudice against placing the names of solicitors on the commission of the peace is passing away. It is beginning to be found that they are really the very best men to discharge the important functions of magistrates, except of course in cases in which a solicitor is in the habit of practising as an advocate in magistrates courts in the district in which he resides, and in which he would be appointed a magistrate. The statutory provisions which forbid the appointment of solicitors as magistrates under certain circumstances are already out of date and ought to be repealed. We hope in our next issue to be able to announce further similar appointments.

THE Master of the Rolls pointed out on Wednesday that regular Chancery actions are delayed by common law actions being set down for trial in the Chancery Division. Similarly we cannot see why actions which are utterly unconnected with the City of London should be permitted to impede the disposal of cases which really belong to the city, and in regard to which it is essential or desirable that city special juries should be called upon to offer their opinion. This is so at present by allowing country cases to be tried in the city which could just as easily be dealt with at Westminster, where the accommodation for judges and all concerned is better than in the city. The junior Bar may well encourage some such alteration, which would operate as an additional power against the monopoly which the leaders of the Bar at present enjoy. It would, however, we maintain, be far more convenient for country solicitors, and all others concerned, except perhaps London agents whose offices are in the city. It should be open to a defendant to remove a cause by order at any stage from the city of London to Westminster. Th present system naturally obstructs legitimate city business, and imposes undue demands upon those city men who are called upon to serve upon city special and common juries. The question of time does not apply as it did under the old regime, when term time was much shorter than the duration of the present sittings.

In another column we publish the Common Law Cause List for the city of London for the present Hilary sittings, which we hope will prove useful to the Profession, especially to country solicitors, a large number of whom are, we know, concerned for one side or the other in many of the actions named in such list, although their names do not appear, the London agents inserting their own names, and which indeed is necessary and advantageous. There are those who suppose that this list only represents litigation in connection with the city of London; this, however, is not the case. Very many of the causes disposed of in the city are essentially country causes, which are tried in the city for the convenience of the plaintiffs' agents. It is worthy of notice that more than half the business to be disposed of in the city this sitting will be before special juries, and not a single case is to be left to the decision of a judge sitting without a jury. The law notices in the daily morning papers used in conjunction with the list we publish will enable solicitors to tell about when a particular case is likely to be reached.

The following is a special form of judgment used in the Queen's Bench Division in the case of an action sent down for trial to a County Court, under sect. 26 of the County Courts Act of 1856. For anything we know to the contrary, a similar form is used in the other Common Law Divisions:

(Title).
The of 187
County Court of under sect. 26 of 19 & 20
Vict. c. 108, and the registrar of the said County Court having certified that the said action was tried on the day of 187, and that [Here follows the finding of the judge.] Therefore it is this day adjudged that the plaintiff do recover against the said defendant £ and £ for his costs of suit.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST SOLICITORS.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

(Before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and GROVE, J.)
Re W. H. MARSHALL.

In this case an order had been granted on the application of Murray, calling on a solicitor to answer matters in an affidavit. The solicitor in question now appeared by counsel in answer to the order of the court.

Murray appeared for the complainant.

Wills appeared for the solicitor.

Hon. A. Thesiger, Q.C., appeared for the Incorporated Law Society.

In answer to the Lord Chief Justice,

Thesiger said that the Incorporated Law Society had thought it right, in deference to an intimation which fell from the court when the order was originally moved for, to instruct counsel to appear, but that it was not proposed to take any active part in the proceedings.

W. Wills, on behalf of the solicitor, then showed cause. From the learned counsel's statement it appeared that the solicitor was employed some time in 1875 by the client at whose instance the process of the court had been now set in motion. He was asked for his accounts in November 1875, and considerable disagreement and consequent correspondence had ensued between the solicitor and his client respecting the amount of the charges which the solicitor had made. The solicitor, however, admitted that a sum of £700 was due to the client after his charges were satisfied, and that he had not paid that sum. In April of last year the client became insane, and his brother demanded payment from the solicitor. Last December the order to answer was obtained, and since that the claims had been paid, and the client's representatives satisfied. The learned counsel submitted that the case was not one for the court to visit with punishment. His client had either made excessive charges or had neglected to pay money which was due; for both of these defaults the law provided a remedy, for the one by taxation, for the other by civil action.

Murray, for the complainant, stated that he was instructed not to press the matter.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., delivered judgment. In this case, said his Lordship, the matter was one of very grave moment, for on the admitted facts the gentleman had kept in his hands for months a large sum of money to which, on his own showing, he had no claim. The solicitor had said that he had a claim for some of the money, but this was not like the case where what was retained was an indivisible article of large value. There might have been some defence to that, but here what the solicitor had kept back was money; the claim of the solicitor being about £380, he had kept back more than £1000. The matter was extremely grave, and the conduct very reprehensible. It might have been visited with the heaviest punishment the court could give. However, as the Law Society, in whose hands the honour of the Profession whom they most worthily represented could most safely rest, had not pressed for punishment; and as the jurisdiction of the court was not to be used to press civil claims, but to preserve the honour of the Profession, and to protect the public, although the answer of the respondent was highly unsatisfactory, the court was content with discharging the order, the solicitor paying all costs.

GROVE, J., concurred.—His Lordship added, that though it was most proper as long as the matter was doubtful, not to report the name of the solicitor, in such a case as the present he thought it right that the name of the solicitor should be mentioned.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., also added, that in his opinion if the case were reported it should be reported with the name of the solicitor.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

(Before MELLOR and LUSH, JJ.)

REG. V. ALLEY JONES.

THIS was an application to remove into this court a prosecution against one Alley Jones, an attorney, for obtaining money by false pretences. The prosecution was by a lady who had been a client of his, and charged him with getting money from her on a supposed security, which did not, she alleged, exist. An application had been made at Chambers, before Lush, J., for a certiorari to remove the case, but the learned judge had not acceded to the application, and the application was now made to the court. The application was based upon the usual grounds, complexity and difficulty, and consequent fitness for a special jury, and probability of questions of law. There was an affidavit by the lady that the defendant had been her attorney for eleven years, since 1866, and that he had obtained money from her upon representations she alleged to be untrue. The money, he said, was to be invested in a speculation in the Basingstoke Canal, she advancing £5000, and Mr. Alley Jones, sen., £1000, and the defendant himself £3000, to be made up either in money or services rendered to her by him. One of the pretences alleged was that Mr. Alley Jones had entered into a contract for the purchase of the canal for so many thousand pounds, and that the lady was to advance money towards the purchase, &c., and that she was induced to believe several things which would impress her with the idea that her money was being advanced upon valuable security, whereas, in truth, as she represented, it was not. On affidavits disclosing the nature of the case,

The Solicitor-General (with Basley), on the part of the defendant, applied for a certiorari to remove the case into this court, that he might have the benefit of a special jury. It was, he said, a prosecution by a lady of her attorney for alleged fraud in a complicated transaction, and this was not fit to be tried by a common jury at the Central Criminal Court. The substantial question, he said, was whether there was a real speculation by the defendant in the canal, or whether the whole thing was a pretence and a fraud; and he feared that the question might be lost sight of by a common jury in a trial at the Central Criminal Court, where there might be some prejudice; it was a case, too, of considerable complexity.

After some discussion, The COURT said it seemed a fit case to be removed to this Court for trial. No doubt, any judge who might try the case at the Central Criminal Court would be perfectly competent to try it; but there was some complexity in it, and there were some topics of prejudice, and, on the whole, therefore, it would be better that the case should be tried in this court before a special jury. The certiorari, therefore, might be issued, the defendant to find recognisances, himself in £1000, and two other persons in £500 each.

PARSONS v. TINLING.

Costs—Nominal damages—No order—Where there is no order made as to costs they follow the event. This case raised a point under the Judicature Acts of great importance, as settling the practice for the future in libel cases. The point, which, although it has been the subject of much discussion, has not before been the subject of judicial determination, arose as follows:—An action of libel was tried before Lopes, J., and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, with damages one farthing. The learned judge declined to make any order as to costs. According to the practice before the Judicature Acts, the result of this would have been that the plaintiff would have obtained no costs. It was contended, however, that by the operation of the Judicature Acts the old statutes on the subject were repealed, and that in every case tried before a jury, if the judge made no order, the costs must follow the event. The plaintiff, therefore, applied to have his costs taxed by the master, but the master refused to tax them. The plaintiff then went before Hawkins, J., at chambers, and that learned judge referred the matter to the court.

Charles Russell, Q.C., and French appeared for the plaintiff, and argued that the effect of the 5th Order of the Judicature Act 1875, was to repeal the prior enactments as to costs in actions of this kind, and to give the plaintiff a right to his costs.

Pope, Q.C. and McConnell appeared for the defendant, and argued that the enactment of the Act of 1875 must be read as subject to the prior statutes, and that costs were to follow the event only in cases in which before the Judicature Acts they would have followed the event.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., delivered judgment in favour of the plaintiff. The Court was called upon, said his Lordship, for the first time, to place a construction on the 55th Order of the Judicature Act of 1875. That Order provided that, subject to the provisions of the Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the High Court should be in the discretion of the Court; and, then, after a reservation applying to certain equity cases, the order proceeded as follows:—"Provided that where any action or issue is tried by a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless upon application made at the trial for good cause shown, the judge before whom such action or issue is tried, or the court, shall otherwise order." The present was an action of libel, and the damages were one farthing. According to the old law in force at the time of the passing of the Judicature Acts, the plaintiff could have got no costs without a certain certificate. This certificate the judge declined to give, but left the matter to stand as the law left it. No discretion had been exercised, and, therefore, the court had simply to construe the words of the statute. It was contended for the defendant that the enactment meant that costs were only to follow the event where before the Act they would have followed the event, and that words to this effect must be read as incorporated into the statute. There were very large words to incorporate and the Lord Chief Justice could see no good reason on the construction of the Act, and certainly none of authority, why such words should be incorporated. The Judicature Acts were intended to bring together for the first time the diverging codes of law and practice which had hitherto existed. The object of the Acts was to assimilate the procedure and make one rule for the divisions of the one court. In general the Equity rules were to prevail, and, as a general rule, costs were to be in the discretion of the court. But two exceptions were made, the first of these was in certain trustee cases in equity, the other was in cases tried before a jury. In the latter the costs are to follow the event, unless it is otherwise ordered. Here the event was for the plaintiff, and no order had been made. The rule was intelligible to everyone, and contained everything relating to costs.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

Inquiries, as to Students' Debating Societies, as to the several Examinations, and as to Admission on the Roll of the Supreme Court, as to being called to the Bar, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, should be addressed to the Editor (Students' Department).

IN our last issue we gave a prominent place in our advertisement columns to particulars connected with the "Law Students' Debating Society," which was established as long since as 1836, and which now has an enrolled strength of 228 members, including many solicitors in actual practice. Meetings of the society, for purposes of debate, are held every Tuesday, at the Law Institution. As the expenditure of such a society cannot be large, we incline to the opinion that the entrance fee might well be reduced by half, if not abolished altogether.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed to be delivered and held in the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, during the ensuing week: Monday, Equity Class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock p.m.; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, ditto; Thursday, lecture on Conveyancing, 6 to 7 o'clock p.m. Subscribers are not admitted to the hall after lectures have commenced.

THE committee of management of the Huddersfield Law Students' Society lately issued a syllabus of subjects for discussion for the first quarter of this year, from which we gather that an excellent plan is being adopted, namely, that comprised in the following notification to the members of the society:—"Statutes of last Session.—At each meeting announced above, one or more of the statutes passed during the last session of Parliament will undergo consideration. Members whose names are placed opposite to any statutes to which reference is made in the syllabus, are expected to make themselves acquainted with the provisions of such statutes, with any judicial interpretation of their meaning, and with their effect upon the former state of the law, so as to be able to give the meeting the benefit of the information which is required. The evening of the 12th Feb. 1877, will be devoted entirely to a discussion upon three of the most important statutes of the last session." We may add that thirteen Acts of last session are specially selected for discussion before the end of March. We feel strongly that every law students' society should adopt a similar plan, by which the members will best inform themselves of the nature of current legislation.

ARTICLES of clerkship, or assignments of articles of clerkship, dated on any day during February, must be enrolled and registered at the Petty Bag Office on or before the same days in the month of August next, and when articles or assignments are required to be, and are, enrolled and registered on any day during the month of February, they must be produced and entered at the Law Institution on or before the same day of the month of May next. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 8 and 9, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 7. Failure to comply with these statutory requirements often entails a loss of time upon article students.

WHERE articles expire between the 9th April and 22nd May, candidates may be examined on the 24th and 25th April next; and if between the 21st May and 2nd Nov., may be examined on the 19th and 20th June next; or, of course, at any subsequent examination. Six weeks' notice at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of the month of examination.

IN case of the death of a principal during articles, fresh articles should always be entered into without loss of time. The time which elapses between the day of the death of the principal and the day of the date of fresh articles being entered into, does not count, so that the further articles must be for a time sufficient to make up for this loss of service, as well as for the unexpired term of the original articles of clerkship.

AN examination certificate is only available for admission on the roll of the Supreme Court within six months from its date, and must otherwise be specially enlarged by an order of the Master of the Rolls, which should be applied for at the Petty Bag Office.

AN ordinary meeting was held on the 30th Jan. In consequence of the inability of the members to obtain the reports of certain cases having reference to the moot point appointed for discussion, an impromptu debate took place on the subject, "Whether the Action for Breach of Promise of Marriage should be Abolished." All the members present took part in the debate, the majority being in favour of the affirmative.

The subject for discussion was, "A, a manufacturer, contracts to supply B, a merchant, with goods, delivering on Feb. 10, complete March 15. A. makes no delivery on Feb. 10, and the next day B. rescinds the contract. Was A. bound to commence delivery on Feb. 10 in order to support an action by him against B. for non-acceptance after tenders of the goods at various dates prior to March 15?"

Mr. Rands opened the debate in the affirmative, and was supported by Mr. Hincks and Mr. Friaby; Mr. Dutton, Mr. Wartnaby, and Mr. Holyoak supported the negative. After the summing up by the chairman the question was put to the meeting, and decided in the affirmative by a majority of three.

The attendance of members was above the average.

LIVERPOOL LAW STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION.

THE second meeting this session was held on Monday, Jan. 22, at the Law Library, Cork-street, W. F. Barrell, Esq., in the chair. After the minutes of the previous meeting had been read by the secretary, Mr. Melhuish, in accordance with his notice of motion, moved, "That the sum of £10 be paid out of the funds of this association towards the expense of a course of lectures, provided that a like, or greater sum be raised for the same object by the Law Society, or individual members thereof, or in any other manner." Seconded by Mr. Algar and opposed by Mr. Rutherford. An animated discussion then ensued, in which Messrs. Sparrow, Norton, Warr, Rutherford, Bremner, Blesse, Lightbound, Wilson, Chabot, Pride, and Broadbridge joined. Mr. Melhuish having replied, the motion was put to the meeting by the chairman and carried by a majority of eight.

The following was the subject for discussion: "Is the owner of a boiler liable for damages caused by its explosion where there has been no negligence on the part of himself or his servants?" Mr. Lightbound supported the affirmative, and Mr. Norton the negative. A discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Pride, Bremner, and Sandys joined. ## NEWPORT (MON.) LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

ON the 17th inst. the first meeting of the society for the Spring Session was held. A. J. David, Esq., in the chair. After questions from "Williams on Real Property" had been considered, a discussion upon moot point 4 followed, viz., "Can there be an acceptance to satisfy the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, so long as the vendor retains his right to stop in transitu?" The following members took part in the discussion: Messrs. Newman, Pierce, Taylor, Oliver, and Llewellyn. The chairman summed up the arguments and put the question to the vote, when the affirmative was carried by a majority of four.

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

THE ordinary weekly meeting of this society was held at Clement's-inn Hall, Strand, on Wednesday evening last, the 31st Jan. Six new members were elected, and one admitted visiting election, being a member of a society in union; and four gentlemen were proposed for election. The Bolton Law Students' Society was also proposed as a society in union. The subject for the evening's discussion, "That the Public Works Act should be repealed, on the ground that it unduly interferes with the right of the Church of England," was opened by Mr. Cavell, and, after a very interesting debate, the motion was lost by a majority of nine, in a meeting of thirty-two.

At the meeting to be held next Wednesday a scheme for the establishment of a Law Library will be brought forward, and an hon. librarian will be nominated. A motion will also be moved to obtain the formal sanction of the society to the holding of meetings on the second and fourth Monday in every month, at the Law Institution, for the discussion of legal questions, after which the following subject will be discussed: "A, of Sheffield, sells goods to B., of London, at three months' credit. During the transit B. becomes bankrupt, and A. exercises his right of stoppage in transitu. The trustee of B.'s bankruptcy claims, before the expiration of the time of credit, to take the goods and pay the price; but A. has previously sold them to a third person. Can the trustee sue A. for breach of contract?"

The witnesses were then elected for the moot trial, which, it was decided, should be postponed until the 23rd Feb. The moot point for the evening was then discussed: "If goods are sold by a trader in the ordinary course of his business on a Sunday, and the purchaser afterwards promises to pay therefor, can the trader maintain an action for the price?" In the affirmative Mr. Helpman, in the negative Mr. Caunter, after the discussion and the summing up of the chairman, the question was put to the vote and decided in the negative by a majority of one vote.

MAGISTRATES' LAW.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Monday, Jan. 29.

REG. v. SLADE.

Grant Act—Conviction—Material qualifying words.

January Quarter Sessions for hearing appeals held to-day by adjournment at the Guildhall, Westminster, for the purpose of disposing of the case of Mr. Henry, better known as Dr. Slade, who appealed against his conviction by Mr. Wiers, the magistrate at Bow-street Police Court, as a rogue and a vagabond.

Upon the case being called on, the ASSISTANT JUDGE requested Mr. E. W. Beal to read the conviction returned to the sessions, which was in the following terms:—

Metropolitan Police District, to wit.—Be it remembered that on the 31st day of October, in the year 1876, at the Bow-street Police Court, in the county of Middlesex, and within the Metropolitan Police District, Henry Slade is convicted before me, the undersigned, one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at police court aforesaid, of being a rogue and a vagabond, within the intent and meaning of a statute made in the fifth year of the reign of late Majesty King George IV., intituled an Act for the Punishment of Idle and Disorderly Persons and Rogues and Vagabonds in that part Great Britain called England—that is to say, for that the said Henry Slade, on the 1st day of September, in the year of our Lord 1876, at No. 8, Upper Bedford-place, in the city and district aforesaid, did unlawfully utter certain subtle craft, means, and device, and subtle craft, means, and device were that said Henry Slade did then and there write certain slate then and there produced by the said Henry Slade certain words purporting to be, and which he intended to represent to Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin, as being words written on the said slate by the spirit of a certain person then deceased—to wit, Allie, the alleged deceased wife of the said Henry Slade, to deceive and impose on certain of Her Majesty's subjects—to wit, the said Edwin Ray Lankester and Horatio Bryan Donkin, then and there being, and for which said offence the said Henry Slade is ordered to be committed to the House of Correction at Coldbath-fields, in the county of Middlesex, there to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months.

"Given under my hand and seal the day and year first above written at the police court aforesaid."

"F. FLOWERS."

Ballantine, Serjt., Besley, and C. Mathews, were counsel for the appellant.

Staveley Hill, Q.C. and Cooper appeared to support the conviction on behalf of the Treasury.

Ballantine, Serjt., said he had a preliminary objection to make which was of a purely legal character, viz., that the conviction was bad upon the face of it. The statute under which it was professed to be made was the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. The 4th section provided that any person pretending or professing to tell fortunes or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of his Majesty's subjects, should be deemed to be a rogue and vagabond, and punishable with three months' imprisonment with hard labour. The only material words under which the conviction could under any possibility have been supported, namely, "by palmistry or otherwise," had been omitted. The defendant was in fact now charged in a form in which it had never been suggested that he could be charged, and in which no offence was disclosed. If the words "by palmistry or otherwise" were mere surplusage, the section was wide enough to cover every imaginable fraud, including cheating at cards, false pretences, and forgery at common law. In support of the argument that the section had no such operation, it was only necessary to quote the case of Johnson v. Fenner (33 Justice of the Peace), in which Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor and Hannen, JJ. held that a conviction of a man for selling packets for a shilling in which he appeared to place a florin or half-crown, and, in fact, placed only a halfpenny, could not be supported under the statute, although the defendant might be indicted for obtaining money under false pretences. In the case of Monck, which had been partly argued in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice, the words "by palmistry or otherwise" were inserted, which in this conviction were omitted.

Hill said that the words "by palmistry or otherwise," after consideration, had been advisedly omitted, and he did not at that stage of the proceedings ask for any amendment. There were two modes in which a conviction could be correctly drawn, either by following the words of the statute or by setting out the means used to deceive, so that the court could judge whether it was an offence against the statute or not. In this conviction, instead of using the bare words of the statute, that the offence was "by palmistry or otherwise," the appellant was charged with using subtle craft, means, and devices, and it was then set out in extenso what the craft, means, and devices were, so that the court might see that the offence was an offence against the statute. The offence was cognate to palmistry. If he had stated it as "by palmistry or otherwise," the conviction would have been bad for uncertainty.

The ASSISTANT-JUDGE suggested that if the words "by palmistry or otherwise" had been inserted and the means had followed under a videlicet, the court could have considered whether the means were means by palmistry or something like palmistry. It could not add to the force of a statute to omit material and qualifying words which it contained.

Hill said that although he retained his opinion as to the form of the conviction being good, he would, in submission to the court, ask for an amendment.

Ballantine, Serjt., still objected to discussing the question of amendment, and at the conclusion of his remarks in reply, the Assistant-Judge and the magistrates retired. They were absent an hour, and, on their return into court,

The ASSISTANT-JUDGE delivered judgment in these terms:—There could be no better illustration than this case of the justice and necessity of the rule that summary convictions must show upon the face of them everything required to give the magistrate jurisdiction, and that, therefore, in citing the statute under which he acts, care must be taken to state it correctly, and not to omit qualifying words which add an indispensable element to the character of the offence with which the law authorises him to deal, and that, therefore, the facts themselves must be set out, so that the court may judge whether they amount in law to the specified offence. The clause in the Vagrant Act upon which this conviction proceeds enacts that "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects, shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond within the meaning of the Act, and be committed to the House of Correction, and there be kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding three months." The conviction, as the learned Serjeant has objected, does not charge the offence in the words of the Act. Contrary to the general rule to be observed in this respect, in its statement of the offence, it follows them in part only, inasmuch as it omits the words "by palmistry or otherwise," which are of vital importance, being descriptive of the character of the craft or device intended by the statute. The reasons for this omission and for framing the conviction in its present form are not far to seek. If the particular description, "by palmistry," were applicable to the case, it was unnecessary to avoid it; and if the facts had been such as to bring the case within the meaning of the general words preceded by the particular description, it would be sufficient to quote the language of the enactment and then proceed to set out the acts and circumstances relied upon to constitute the offence. From either point of view the omission of these qualifying words occurring in the statute is significant of the difficulty felt in placing them in juxtaposition with the actual facts. Mr. Hill, however, contends that the conviction is sufficient on the face of it for this purpose. The court is of the contrary opinion. The word "otherwise" following the particular description or example in a penal statute must, of course, be construed in accordance with the restrictive rule applicable in such cases—that is to say, the means used to deceive and impose must be by palmistry or a craft or device ejusdem generis. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Johnson v. Fenner, referred to by the learned Serjeant, is conclusive on this point; and inasmuch as the conviction omits these essential and qualifying words, and then sets out facts which might possibly constitute an offence under the enactment had it contained no such qualifying words, but which might or would amount to no offence had the Act been properly set out, we think it is bad upon the face of it; and, as the learned counsel for the Crown has declined to ask the court to amend it, we must quash this conviction.

Hill asked for a case to be stated on the legal question thus raised.

Ballantine, Serjt. pointed out that his learned friend could apply to the Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel the Sessions to hear the appeal.

The ASSISTANT-JUDGE said they must leave Mr. Hill to take that course. Having no doubt on the point, they could not keep the appellant under recognizances.

Hill said that the point would be raised, but out of respect to the court he had felt bound to ask for a case.

The appellant then left the court with friends, and the proceedings terminated.

APPEAL—JUDGE'S NOTES—THE COUNTY COURTS ACT 1875, SECT. 6.

Re AN APPEAL FROM THE MARYLEBONE COUNTY COURT.

THIS was another of the cases of which there have been several within the last few days, apparently deciding that a County Court judge is not bound to take a note of the facts in evidence before him, except upon some point of law taken at the hearing, and on which he decides and is expressly requested to take a note, and that therefore, except in such case, he is not bound to produce his note for the purpose of an appeal, under the enactment for that purpose in the Act of 1875, sect. 6. That enactment, in order to afford an easier and less dilatory and expensive proceeding by way of appeal, provides that the judge, if so called upon at the hearing, shall be bound to take a note of the evidence relating to any particular point of law raised before him. It does not in terms at all interfere with any power of the suitor or the Superior Court to call for the notes for the purpose of an appeal on the general matters of law involved in the decision, but the judges of this court appear to have considered that this enactment affords the only mode of enforcing the production of the notes, and therefore that an applicant must bring himself strictly within it, or is remitted to the dilatory proceeding by special case.

Cock now moved on this enactment for an extension of the time for obtaining the notes of the County Court Judge of Marylebone for the purpose of an appeal. The four days within which

The first question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of trespass. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant entered upon his land without his consent and without any legal right to do so. The defendant denies this, claiming that he has a legal right to enter upon the land. The court must first determine whether the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of trespass. If he has, the burden then shifts to the defendant to prove that he has a legal right to enter upon the land. The plaintiff's evidence consists of the fact that the defendant entered upon his land without his consent. This is sufficient to establish a prima facie case of trespass. The defendant's evidence consists of the fact that he has a legal right to enter upon the land. This is sufficient to rebut the plaintiff's prima facie case. The court must then determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to rebut the plaintiff's prima facie case. If it is, the plaintiff's case fails. If it is not, the plaintiff's case succeeds.

The second question presented by the case is whether the defendant is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The defendant argues that the plaintiff's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the plaintiff's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the defendant. If it is, the defendant is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the defendant is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The court must then determine whether the plaintiff's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the defendant. If it is, the defendant is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the defendant is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The third question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The fourth question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The fifth question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The sixth question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The seventh question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The eighth question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

The ninth question presented by the case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal. The plaintiff argues that the defendant's evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict against him. The court must determine whether the defendant's evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the plaintiff. If it is, the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment of acquittal. If it is not, the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of acquittal.

Act had just commenced, and from a legal periodical he saw that in what was called the Common Law Division of the High Court of Justice, i.e., the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer Division, there were 1300 cases remaining for hearing and argument, while in the Court of Chancery there were between 600 and 700 cases, and that the number had doubled within two years. To his mind this state of affairs proved beyond all question that what was wanted was not concentration in London, but distribution throughout the country. But in London they could not trust provincial courts. They had an opinion that the local judge must in some way be infected by the influences which surrounded him; that he could not dine with a nobleman, or accept the hospitality of a merchant prince, without being subject to some illegitimate influence. Now, he said to such people, "Come and see." His object was, if he could, to get rid of that block of business in London. London lawyers were urging the appointment of more judges. Well, let them appoint more judges. The last request that was made on that subject had been made by a friend of his Mr. Osborne Morgan, who suggested that there should be two more Chancery judges. An exactly similar request, or recommendation, was made by the Chancery Commissioners in their report of 1851, on which report the Act of 1852 was founded. Now, to appoint two additional judges at the present time would, in his humble opinion, be a very inefficient mode of remedying the evil. Let him give a practical instance of how it would act. On Friday morning he had had occasion to view some machinery in connection with an action. There were two gentlemen with him, and one of them said that he was engaged in a Bradford action which was being tried in Middlesex—and which, by the bye, ought to be tried here—and that some weeks before the briefs had been delivered to the barristers, and on inquiry on Friday he was told that his case stood 509 on the Middlesex list. Now, in consequence of Easter falling early this year—public convenience requiring that the assizes should finish before Good Friday—the judges intended to commence their circuits on the 15th Feb. That left the judges one calendar month, during which period alone they had the means of sitting in London to dispose of the enormous arrears of cases of which he had given them an idea. One suggestion as to a mode of carrying into effect not only the suggestion of the County Court judges, but the recommendation of the Judicature Commission, as a means of remedying the evil was to give unlimited jurisdiction to County Courts throughout the whole country. This suggestion had been proposed and carefully drawn up by Mr. Harrington, the County Court Judge of the agricultural portion of Northamptonshire and Warwickshire, who had elaborated the proposal with great care, and had estimated the expenses. The objection to this scheme was that the requirements of the different parts of the country were not the same—that they did not require the same kind of courts in the agricultural districts as they required in the great commercial centres of Yorkshire and Lancashire; that in the latter far more important and complicated questions were raised. Besides that, there was the objection that every County Court judge was not equal to the work. Then, there was another suggestion as to the mode of meeting the evil for which he (the speaker) considered himself responsible. He had been asked to meet a deputation of representatives of Chambers of Commerce for the purpose of considering the advisability of introducing into a Bill a provision enabling the Queen, by an order in Council, upon the petition of a municipal body representing a town or city with, say, over 50,000 inhabitants, to grant to the County Court of that district unlimited jurisdiction. It seemed to him that that was a mode of getting rid of the difficulty arising from the supposed incompetency of some of the courts to exercise such an extended jurisdiction, because he was quite sure that the municipal body of such a town would not ask for extended jurisdiction unless they were satisfied with the existing arrangements; at any rate, such a municipal body would not ask for an extension unless they were satisfied that the interests of the public would be promoted by the extension. The objection to this arrangement was that it depended on any town having for the time an efficient registrar or an efficient judge, and that either one or the other might retire or die, and an inefficient might succeed. He had had that objection put to him by an ex-Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne. His reply to the objection simply was, that it was the duty of the Lord Chancellor to see that a good man was appointed, and that he should not be influenced by political partisanship or by personal friendship, but by the fitness of the man for the place. (Hear, hear.) That scheme, however, was never brought forward. Another measure had been prepared by a County Court judge, who had previously had the experience of a secretary to the Judicature Commission. The object of which he (Mr. Daniel) had studied, and certain centres in various parts of the country, to which should be attached judges of higher standing than the ordinary County Court judges, who could be resident, and who should have unlimited jurisdiction on all matters that came under the cognizance of the higher court, with power of removal in certain cases. Lancashire was one principal centre, with Liverpool and Manchester as capitals, and joining with Lancashire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, giving three judges to the centre. Northumberland and Durham constituted another centre, with Newcastle as the capital, and with one judge. For Yorkshire two judges were proposed, with Leeds and Bradford as the principal towns, though, of course, any place might be made a chief town which the Lord Chancellor might at any time think desirable. The midland districts constituted another centre with Birmingham as the capital, and the south-western counties another centre, with Bristol as the principal place. Power was given to the Queen by an order in council to make other centres whenever it should be thought necessary. The ordinary business which now blocked the London courts would be all transacted at these centres. Whether such a scheme as this were adopted or not, he believed that experience would very shortly show that the attempt that was being made to force all these omnibuses through Temple Bar would not succeed. So far as administration was concerned, he felt sure that distribution would be the principle that would have to be adopted, while so far as the settlement of the law was concerned concentration was the principle to be adopted—an easy means of appeal from the provincial to the Superior Courts. The Bill which he had described was being prepared under the auspices of the Newcastle Chamber of Commerce, with the assistance of Mr. Cowen, one of the members for Newcastle, who had expressed his willingness and determination to introduce a Bill into the House of Commons. He (Mr. Daniel) hoped that such a Bill would have the support of the other Chambers of Commerce throughout the country. He had been requested also to say a few words as to the law of bankruptcy. They would know that a Bill on the subject had been introduced during the last session of Parliament by the Lord Chancellor, but had been withdrawn. He did not know whether the same Bill would be brought forward again, and it was not of course for him to express an opinion. They would be aware, however, that the Lord Chancellor had appointed a committee to report to him with reference to the working of the bankruptcy laws, and the result of the inquiries of that committee had been to show the unfavourable working of the present bankruptcy laws in reference to the cost. The Controller, Mr. Mansfield Parkins, who was a member of that committee, had, indeed, added a report of his own in which he very strongly recommended the abolition of the present system of management by creditors, and a return to the system of official management. How far any new legislation would assume the character of a return to the official system he had no means of knowing, and he would not hazard a conjecture. But this he must say, that as far as his experience went, creditors were much too remiss in looking after their own interests. He confessed when he saw this—and he had expressed the opinion before and had given his reasons for holding it—he should like to see the present system, so far as it enabled a debtor to come to Court when he found that he was insolvent, to be continued in this way, that instead of allowing the debtor to file a petition for liquidation and then by means of such assistance as he could get from accountants and solicitors and proxies, secure the management in his own hands, that a debtor when he presented his petition to the court should accompany that petition by a statement of his debts, an estimate of his assets, and a list of his creditors, and that he should verify this statement on oath; that then the Court, by its own proper officers, should itself appoint a day and place for the meeting of the creditors—a day and place, of course, selected with a view to the convenience of the great body of the creditors; that, having so appointed a place and a day, notices should be sent to every creditor, with the information that he could have a copy of the debtor's list of debts, assets, and names of creditors on payment of a small charge to cover the cost of copying the list, so that before the day of meeting every creditor might have the means of knowing the whole extent of the debtor's assets, the amount of his liabilities, and might in that way have an opportunity of making inquiries. He would further suggest that when a debtor intended to offer a composition he should accompany his statement of assets, &c., with that offer, and that it should be submitted to the creditors in order that they might know before the meeting what they ought to know as to the debtor's position and what he proposed to offer them. At such a meeting, held before an officer of the court who should be empowered to control the proceedings and to maintain order and regularity—for he heard that many creditors' meetings were little better than bear-gardens (hear, hear)—he thought much might be done to prevent those miscarriages which now too frequently took place at meetings of creditors, where debtors got resolutions passed accepting compositions. If that were done he thought many of the recent objections to the system of compositions would be removed. There was this fact in reference to the returns as to these compositions—that the number of them was increasing while the average amount of the compositions was decreasing. The existing law as to fraudulent preferences was about as bad as it could be; it enabled any man who knew that he was insolvent, if he only took care to keep that knowledge to himself, to realise all his assets, to pay in full such creditors as he thought it would be in interest to make friends of, by that means to reduce his assets to just sufficient to pay the expenses of a liquidation, and then to leave the great body of his creditors without a penny. In his opinion the law ought to try to touch the consciences of the creditors, and to make them know that they had no right to take 20s. in the pound at the expense of the other creditors. Mr. Daniel, after alluding to the necessity that the law should do something to check the system of gambling which had lately shown itself in connection with many of our commercial transactions, expressed the hope that the time would soon come when suitors would be able to get their disputes settled at a reasonable cost and with a reasonable amount of delay, and his belief that that could only be done by the extension of the jurisdiction of local courts.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Wednesday, Jan. 31.

(Before Mr. Registrar MURRAY, sitting as Chief Judge.)

Re WILLIAM BAINES.

Trustees—Costs.

THIS was an application by Morris, solicitor, a creditor, requiring the trustee under this liquidation to show cause why he should not file a statement of the payments made out of the sum of £393, realised from the estate of the debtor; and also why his bill of £172 for services rendered should not be taxed, and for other directions.

Morris appeared in person.

Beard, jun., for the trustee.

Copp for creditors.

The debtor, a house agent, carrying on business in Elsham-road, Kensington, presented a petition for liquidation in May 1874. His debts were then returned at £1063, of which £77 were in respect of rent, and other preferential claims; with assets £504. At the first meeting a resolution was passed by the creditors for a liquidation by arrangement. Mr. J. Pattinson, accountant, being appointed trustee, to act with a committee of inspection, consisting of three members. From the assets sums of £293 and £100 were received by the trustee, and a dividend of 6d. in the pound had been declared and paid. In August last a meeting of creditors was convened for the purpose of granting the debtor his discharge, and to audit and pass the trustee's accounts, to release the trustee, and to close the liquidation. It is sufficient to state that at the meeting an account of the trustee was produced, by which he claimed to deduct £172 for remuneration, and two members of the committee of inspection audited and passed such account. The present application was based upon the grounds that the charges of the trustee were exorbitant, and that the account had not been properly audited and passed by the committee.

In answer it was stated that considerable time had been devoted to the investigation of the matter, and that the trustee's remuneration had been considered at the meeting, and the claim duly allowed.

Mr. Registrar MURRAY said it was perfectly monstrous that any committee of inspection could be found to sanction the charges of the trustee unless they could be proved. He pointed out that, according to the account, the trustee had been occupied during forty-one days of eight hours each upon the present case, and that his clerk had been similarly engaged for about 330 hours. For his own services the trustee claimed £3 3s. per day, and £1 1s. per day for his clerk. His Honour said the taxing master did not tax the bills of trustees in matters of liquidation, otherwise he might require an affidavit to be filed; for it was utterly shocking to common sense to think that any human being could be found to sign such a document. He did not think the exigencies of the Act in regard to notice had been complied with, and he was unwilling to receive an affidavit by the trustee that the accounts were presented to the meeting. It was right the creditors should have an opportunity of considering the whole matter, and the present application would be adjourned, in order that a meeting might be held.

if a receiver has been appointed by the court the nominee of the creditors shall be forthwith substituted. It will be observed that, although the creditors are only empowered to appoint in the absence of any previous appointment by the court, yet the latter portion of the rule ignores such a requirement, and provides for the creditors' nominee being substituted for that of the court. The present application was to cancel the appointment of Mr. Bolland as receiver, and to confirm the appointment of the creditors' nominee—Mr. Hunt, of Manchester—in his stead. The liquidating debtor is a draper in West Derby-road, with debts £1000 and assets £500. He presented his petition a week ago, and Mr. Bolland, at the instance of Mr. Seddon Smith, the solicitor in the matter, was appointed by the court receiver. He obtained an order upon the sheriff to restrain him from enforcing an execution then in his hands, and undertook personally to be answerable for any damages the execution creditor might suffer by being restrained. The principal creditors, being Manchester warehousemen, subsequently nominated Mr. Hunt receiver, in place of Mr. Bolland, and Mr. Lockett now asked the court to make an order accordingly.

His HONOUR, after taking time to consider the question, said—Mr. Lockett, on behalf of certain creditors, has applied for the substitution of Mr. Hunt as receiver in place of Mr. Bolland. Mr. Bolland was by the court, under the provisions of general rule 620, appointed receiver, since which he has entered into obligations which render it specially inexpedient to displace him. After his appointment the creditors nominated Mr. Hunt as receiver, and the court is asked to confirm the substitution under rule 262. As I cannot find, either in the statute or the rules, any power given to creditors to appoint a receiver where one has already been appointed by the court, I do not feel warranted in acting under that portion of rule 262 which speaks of a nominee for whose creation of legal existence no provision has been made.

Lockett stated that the question raised was one of the utmost importance to Manchester accountants, and he should, with all respect to the court, advise an appeal, and he therefore wished the amount of deposit to be fixed.

Watson said £10 would be sufficient, the simple question being what was the proper construction of an ill-drawn rule.

Re BARKER.

Proxies in blank.

THIS was a first meeting.

Etty appeared for the principal creditors.

A proof of debt upon a judgment was tendered but refused admission, on the ground that the judgment was not produced. Objection was also taken by Mr. Etty to a proxy on the ground that the name of the proxy had been inserted subsequently to the creditor affixing his signature to the form. The objection was upheld, as the proxy could not produce the authority of the creditors to introduce his name. Debts amounting to £600 were proved, and Mr. Bolland chosen trustee, with a committee of inspection. With respect to the committee the learned registrar said that he observed two of the members were proxies for creditors jointly with another gentleman, and the latter only was present. A proxy, to be enabled to act as a committeeman, must be present to exercise his right to vote; but here the proposed committeemen were not present, their qualification to act as proxies being exercised by another gentleman who was named in the proxy. The names of the proposed committeemen were accordingly erased. A sitting for public examination was appointed for the 2nd of March, and Mr. Etty was retained as solicitor in the prosecution of the bankruptcy.

CHESTER COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, Jan. 25.

(Before HOBART LLOYD, Esq., Judge.)

BATE v. HUGHES AND ANOTHER.

Claim for damages against a trustee in bankruptcy.

Swetenham (instructed by Kelly and Keene, of Mold) appeared for the defendants.

Churton represented the plaintiff.

It was an action brought to recover the sum of £50, in respect of damages entailed upon the plaintiff in consequence of the defendants breaking in upon a certain close of land near the New-inn, Ewloe, and therefrom unlawfully removing certain hay and straw.

On the application of Mr. Swetenham, his Honour consented to amend the particulars subject to any postponement of the case that Mr. Churton might think necessary, after hearing the plaintiff.

Swetenham stated that a man named Edward Thornton, some twenty-four years ago, became tenant of a public house and outlet, and thirty-three acres of land, situate at Ewloe. The taking of the land and the public house and outlet were separate takings, as it would be proved that the rents of the public house and outlet were payable half yearly, on the 25th March and the 29th Sept., and the rent of the land on the 2nd Feb. and the 2nd Aug. As far as regarded the outlet and public house there was no agreement in writing, the tenancy being merely yearly, at £12 a year, whilst the land was held under an agreement entered into in 1875. Inasmuch, however, as that agreement was insufficiently stamped, he did not propose to put it in evidence, but should simply rely upon proof of the fact that the tenancy existed between Thornton and the late Mr. Edward Bate. In August last Thornton filed a petition for liquidation, and at the meeting of creditors the defendant Mr. Hughes, was appointed trustee. Mr. Hughes employed Messrs. Churton and Elphick, auctioneers, to sell the furniture on the 12th Sept. together with the hay in the croft adjoining the house and the growing crops and straw; but, on the morning of the sale, Mr. Bate, through Mr. Armour, his agent, gave notice to the auctioneer that he claimed the furniture, and that the hay and straw should not be sold to be consumed off the premises. The result was that the furniture was not sold at the sale, and the hay and crops were bought by the defendant, Henry Hughes, at a very low price. On the 13th Sept. the defendant received a disclaimer, signed by the trustee, and he (Swetenham) contended that the result of the disclaimer was, under the 20th section of the Bankruptcy Act to terminate the tenancy and prevent the persons who bought at the sale from removing the hay or the growing crops. The defendant sold the hay and the growing crops at a great profit, and the cause of action by the plaintiff was that the defendant had no right to cut the crops and to remove them, and he claimed the sum of £50 damages, inasmuch as he contended that the landlord, although having received the rent of the public-house up to the 29th Sept. from the trustee, and for the land up to the 2nd August, had nothing to fall back upon for his rent when the same became due. He strongly commented upon the conduct of the trustee in selling under such circumstances, and particularly to his own brother, and said he was sure his Honour would see that his client had suffered great injury.

He called in support of his statement Mr. John Armour, Mr. Bates' agent, Mr. Elphick, the auctioneer, Mr. John Miller, farm bailiff to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Thomas Davies, a tenant under the same gentleman, and the two defendants.

Churton said he was very much surprised at the turn the case had taken, and said it was quite clear that the action was entirely misconceived, and that this attempt to set up the trespass was only in consequence of the plaintiff not having the courage to put in the agreement and pay the penalty for its being insufficiently stamped. In the first instance he contended that there was no evidence whatever of the tenancy between Thornton and the late Mr. Bate, inasmuch as the evidence which the former had given as to the payment of the rent or by goods was mere hearsay, and the entries that he had made in his book were only written by him from statements made by another person, which was not evidence. He submitted that unless there was an agreement in writing between the parties as to the tenancy no verbal evidence was admissible either as to the tenancy or the terms of it.

His HONOUR said he should hold that it was not necessary that the parties to the agreement should prove that there was a tenancy, but if any evidence had been given as to the terms of it he should then have insisted that the agreement should have been produced.

Churton repudiated somewhat warmly the reflections which Mr. Swetenham had seen fit to cast upon the two Hugheses in regard to their connection with the transaction, and said that Mr. Hughes, who was a respectable grocer at Wrexham, had done all in his power, as trustee, to realise the estate for the benefit of the creditors, as illustrated by the fact that he had employed Messrs. Churton and Elphick to sell the property. When the sale was advertised no conditions whatever were attached to the disposal of the property, and a large company were present on the day of sale, and had it not been for the conduct of Mr. Bate, no doubt a considerable sum would have been realised for the benefit of the creditors, but the action of Mr. Bate had resulted in a most deplorable loss to the estate, inasmuch as, without having previously given any notice to himself as solicitor to the trustee, or to the auctioneer before the sale, but at the last moment, on the day of the sale, and at the place of sale, the notice was suddenly sprung upon the trustee, which resulted in the sale of the furniture being entirely postponed and conditions being attached to the sale of the hay, straw, and crops, had the effect of only obtaining a small sum for them. The reflections which had been cast upon Mr. Henry Hughes as to the small sums that he had paid, and the benefit that he himself had derived from afterwards obtaining better prices, were entirely uncalled for, because in the presence of a large company he had bought the various articles by auction, he had been the highest bidder for them, and if they had been worth more on the sale subject to these conditions, of course other people would have given more for them; but in fact he bought to a certain extent, a "pig in a poke," without knowing what the result would be, and although it fortunately resulted in a profit to himself, it might have resulted in a loss. In an action for trespass the plaintiff was bound to show by what he had actual or constructive possession, in this case it was perfectly clear that the plaintiff neither had actual nor constructive possession of the premises at the time of the alleged trespass. In the first place there were two objections to the disclaimer, namely, that in the first place it was bad in law, because the leave of the court had not been obtained, pursuant to the 28th rule of the Bankruptcy Act 1871, prior to its being given. That rule, his Honour would observe, was very positive, and stated that the trustee shall not disclaim any property of a leasehold without having first obtained the leave of the court and without having given certain notice as mentioned in the rule. But there was another objection to the disclaimer, and that was that it did not include the estate from which the crops were taken, but only included the public-house and the outlet field; and that was proved conclusively by the order which was made by the court subsequently on the application of Mr. Bate, by which possession was ordered to be given to him of the public-house and outlet field only, and that at the present moment the land was actually in the possession of the trustee. But even supposing the disclaimer was good, it was quite clear the hay which was severed from the land before the petition for liquidation was filed was the property of the trustee, being the ordinary goods and chattels which he had a right to dispose of and therefore, there could be no ground of action whatever as to the hay. And with reference to the crops, it was equally clear that the action for trespass could not lie, because the effect of the disclaimer, even supposing it to be good, would result in terminating the lease under the 23rd section, and the position of the trustee would be that of a tenant holding over after the termination of tenancy; and in that case it was clear no action for trespass would lie against the defendant, although an action of ejectment might lie. Therefore, being outgoing tenant, he should have all the rights under the common law which outgoing tenants usually had, and one of these was the right of possession of the land upon which any growing crops were growing, that had been decided over and over again—that although the tenancy had expired, yet by the custom of the country, an outgoing tenant was entitled by law to the possession of the land upon which his crops were growing, and could actually himself maintain trespass against an incoming tenant or any other person from going upon such land. He contended, therefore, that Mr. William Hughes was entitled and was actually now in the possession of the land upon which the crops had been sold; and that in addition to that, it had been decided that where a lessee became bankrupt and his assignees refused to accept the lease, that they were entitled to the off-going crops on paying rent up to the time when possession was delivered up: (Ex parte Mansel, 2 Mad. 315.) Therefore, even supposing an outgoing tenant he was not entitled to the away-going crops, yet as trustee he clearly was so entitled, inasmuch as he had paid all the rent of the land upon which the crops were growing that was due at the time. With reference to the question of damages he submitted that the sum was ridiculous—that Mr. Bate had no right to derive a profit from the labour and expenditure of the debtor; it was clear the creditors alone ought to have the benefit of what he had spent and what he had there—and not for Mr. Bate to seek to obtain an advantage at the expense of the creditors of the debtor. It was also clear that Mr. Wm. Hughes was no party to the trespass whatever, inasmuch as he had no interest in the crops either one way or the other, and so far as he was concerned, therefore, there must be a verdict in his favour.

His HONOUR said that he should reserve his judgment till the next court.

DEATH OF MR. ERLE, Q.C.—The Right Hon. Peter Erle, Q.C., brother of Sir William Erle, formerly Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, died on the 28th Jan. Mr. Erle was called to the Bar on the 1st June, 1821, was appointed Chief Charity Commissioner for England and Wales and a Privy Councillor, 1872. He was 83 years of age.

SSION DUTY.—In the case put by your correspondent, "A Subscriber," I do not think sion duty attaches at all, but legacy duty. before the Succession Duty Act was passed, tate directed by will to be sold was liable y, although the proceeds might have been d to be laid out in the purchase of other tate, and in such case the duty was to be d and paid in the same manner, in all ts as if it had been personal estate which en directed so to be laid out (see 36 Geo. 3, s. 19; and 48 Geo. 3, c. 149). The pur- need not inquire whether the legacy duty n paid, as such duty does not attach to the tate directed to be sold, but to the money, ceeds of the intended sale. The property d to be sold is considered in equity as sold, mmediately on the death testator, legacy comes payable. An absolute direction in to sell, although not acted on, lets in the duty: (Attorney-General v. Holford, 1 26).

(1) Does the fact of execution sever the joint tenancy, and cause B.'s moiety to revert to the donor's estate? (2) What would be the effect of A. allowing six months to elapse without enrolment after execution? Would the disentailing assurance be void ab initio, and so cause A., as survivor, to take the whole estate tail?

83. DOWER.—A. was married after 1834 and died in 1873 intestate, insolvent, possessed of real estate, and leaving a widow and an infant heir. In a suit for the administration of the intestate's estate it becomes necessary to sell the real estate to pay debts. The purchaser requires the concurrence of the widow in the conveyance, on the grounds that her right to dower is prior to the right of the creditors to be paid out of the real estate. The conveyance to A. contains no declaration to bar dower, nor is it barred in any other way. Is the purchaser's view correct? See 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105, s. 5; Spyer v. Wyatt (20 Beav. 621; 25 L. 85. STAMPS.—A mortgage of freeholds and copyholds, say to secure a £1000, should not the ad valorem stamp (£1 5s.) be on the mortgage deed, and the surrender stamped with a 10s. stamp? Or does the surrender also require the same stamp, 25s., or is the surrender stamped 5s. (viz., 6d. per £100 as an additional security)?

86. LAW OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.—I have never been able to get at the rights of husband and wife in the following case: perhaps some of your correspondents can tell me where to look for a correct exposition, or will answer in these columns: Real property is devised to a married woman, but not to her separate use; on her decease, does it descend to her child subject to her husband's curtesy? Can she make a will devising it, and so deprive the husband of his curtesy? If she die without issue, and her husband survive her, what right has he in the land? If she survive him, I presume that any attempted disposition by his will would be void.

87. COPYHOLDS.—(1) Where copyholds are mortgaged together with freehold property and the ad valorem duty is impressed on the mortgage deed, which contains a covenant to surrender, what is the proper duty chargeable on the surrender of the copyholds? Sect. 110 of the Stamp Act 1870, is hardly clear on the point. (2) On such mortgage being redeemed, the re-conveyance of the freeholds bearing ad valorem duty, is the warrant to the steward to vacate the surrender of the copyholds chargeable with any and what duty? In practice it is often contended that no duty is chargeable on the warrant.

ANSWERS.

(Q. 70.) VENDORS AND PURCHASERS.—Unless time is expressly stated to be of the essence of the contract, the Court of Equity will decree specific performance of the contract, although the day fixed for completion has passed; see 36 and 37 Vict., c. 68, sect. 25, sub-sect. 7. If the purchaser has been guilty of gross or wilful neglect, the Court of Equity will allow the contract to be avoided, Dart's V. & P., 5th Ed., 421 and 422. Equity regards the spirit of the transaction, and not the letter of the law. The usual practice is that the purchaser shall receive the rents of the estate, and pay interest on the purchase money from the day fixed for completion.

C. H. S.

(Q. 75.) MORTGAGE.—The question does not state whether or not the will of A. contained any general devise of real estate. If it does the legal estate in the mortgage property might devolve on the devise, who could transfer to B. A.'s executors could, under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, appoint a new trustee, but they could not, under that Act, vest in him the legal estate in the mortgaged property, so that he might transfer it to B. But it seems that by virtue of the Vendors' and Purchasers' Act 1874, ss. 4 and 5 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), the executors of A. can transfer the mortgage and vest the legal estate in the transferee.

LEGAL NEWS.

THE LAW'S DELAY.—An "Old Practitioner" writes to the Times:—"The complaints made by your correspondents Messrs. Ellis and Co., with regard to the ruin and loss brought upon litigants by the law's delay, can be repeated with even new illustrations by every honest practitioner throughout the country. The evil is most crying. The remedy for it does not consist in codification, as the Lord Chief Justice vainly suggests, or in any other sweeping measure of law reform. Our Common Law Procedure Acts and our Judicature Acts—monuments of the enlightened jurisprudence of our time—have already done as much for the change of our law and practice as is necessary for many years. If the provisions of these Acts were successfully carried out by the Bench and the Bar, litigants would have no cause of complaint. In law we want "men and not measures" at present. This is the opinion of the majority of practitioners, and if we dared speak out in all truth in Parliament and elsewhere, without regard to our personal prejudices and our respect for the judges, we would say that in our opinion the evils complained of would be best cured by the following means: 1. The appointment of three more Common Law Judges and of two more Vice-Chancellors. 2. The selection for the Bench of younger men, in the prime of life, with their energies and interest in work unabated. An eminent Queen's Counsel is reported recently to have said that there were now no men at the Bar fit to be raised to the Bench! On the contrary, most lawyers would say that never in our history were there more able and accomplished men more honourable and more worthy of the position of judges than those who now throng the courts of Lincoln's-inn and Westminster Hall. I could venture to nominate 100 Chancery barristers and 100 Common Law barristers, all of whom would make excellent judges. Why always look round for aged men, who seek repose and not work? Lord Cowper was Lord Chancellor when he was forty, and Queen Anne, seeing how young he looked, 'wearing his own hair, obliged him to cut it off, telling him the world would say she had given the seals to a boy.' And although he was not gifted with extraordinary genius, by his devotion to work and energy he added new lustre to the high office which he held. Much would be gained to the country if younger men were raised to the Bench. 3. The localization of the trial of issues of fact. London agents have availed themselves of certain provisions of the Judicature Acts to bring all causes to London. The result is that the courts are blocked. The local venue ought to be insisted upon unless there are strong reasons for a trial elsewhere. The whole principle of our common law upon the point is entirely ignored by our judges and masters, and by solicitors, much to the detriment of suitors and of jurors in London and Middlesex, who are now becoming judges of fact for the whole country. 4. The utilisation for the purpose of the trials of fact of local courts. Power ought to be given to judges and masters to remit to the County Court for trial all actions in which the sum sought to be recovered does not exceed £200. The record for final judgments and for motions could be kept in the High Court of Justice. The Merchant Shipping Act of last session affords another valuable suggestion. The courts of recorders—and I mean those only who are appointed by the Queen's sign manual under the Municipal Corporations Act—are presided over by men of experience and position. I think it would be well if judges and masters had the power to send issues of fact for trial to them. 5. The referring of causes that ought to be referred early, and before they are set down for trial. With reference to this, I have to make a serious charge against solicitors. There are certain cases that we who are in practice know not to be triable by judge and jury. Take a builder's bill for example. It never can be tried. Counsel on one side says he disputes every item, and then the briefs are tied up. It is disgraceful to think how many of such cases are entered for trial. Counsel are briefed in them with enormous fees, the lists are crowded with them, and all for no possible object except that of bringing fees to the professional men engaged. The power of a judge at chambers to order such cases to be referred compulsorily is now complete by the Judicature Acts. Why, then, in all honesty, do not solicitors early take out summonses to refer, and thus save the Profession from a lasting disgrace? 6. The payment of the official referees by the State, and the increase of their numbers. Great expectations were raised by the appointment of these officers, and these have been most bitterly disappointed. An order of the judges came out to the effect that parties are still to pay them out of their own pockets. The result is that they have been avoided. For the work that is really to be done by referees we certainly require that their number should be doubled at least. If these suggestions were adopted and faithfully carried out, our law system, such as it now is, would be equal with the times. We are passing into new stages of our professional history, and the sooner we of the Bar and the judges and the Bench recognise this fact the better will it be for ourselves and the country. Things are very bad now, and, that being so, it is useless for us to talk of our culture and learning. If culture and learning will not do the work well which the country requires, then the country must get something else to do it; and the energy of the solicitors clamouring outside must come in to have their trial. All my prejudices are with the traditions of the Bar and the high honour of the Bench. I trust we may all awaken to the new claims made upon us by the country before it is too late."

A SOLICITOR writes: "With reference to the terrible cost and inconvenience which the delay and waste of judicial strength in the Folkestone case entails on litigants, let me quote an instance. I have a case waiting for hearing in the Admiralty Division. A large and valuable ship, with a full cargo and crew on board, all ready for sea, is being necessarily detained until the trial. The witnesses who are in her cannot be kept on shore without great loss and inconvenience, and some risk to the ship, and they cannot be examined before the trial without risk of losing the case. The Judge of the Admiralty Division is one of the judges engaged in hearing the Folkestone case. The consequence is that 'no human being can tell' when the ship in question will be able to sail. I have no doubt that there are many other litigants to whom this block of judicial business causes still more loss and inconvenience than it does to my clients. The real work of litigation is neglected, while this trumpety question of candles, vestments, and attitudes, about which no sane man ought to care one pinch of snuff, is being solemnly argued before a Bench of judges strong enough to decide on the most vital question which could come before a Court of Law."

THE Irish Government, it is said in Dublin, are likely to make the Civil Bill Courts Bill their chief article of legal reform during the coming session, and to postpone for another year any more serious changes in the administration of the law.

MESSRS STRAKER AND SONS, of Fenchurch-street, send us a prospectus of the fac-simile printing process (Byford's patent), in which it states by the novel invention fac-simile copies of documents, plans, &c., written with the patent ink, are printed in a few minutes on any description of paper with the aid of the ordinary copying press, the original writing remaining uninjured, and that it is suited to the requirements of solicitors and others who want duplicate copies of documents.

The judges in the Exchequer Division have decided in favour of the Crown upon the question of the liability of the estate of Madame Gasquet to pay legacy duty. She was a native of France, but had resided in London nearly forty years, with only one short break in 1853, when she visited her native country. Her estate was worth £8000. The judges decided that the testatrix was domiciled in England, and that legacy duty must be paid.

A VERSATILE MAGISTRATE.—At the Guildford County Bench, Lord Middleton in the chair, a man named James Williams was brought up on a charge of soliciting alms by the presentation of a petition couched in the most plaintive terms of charitable appeal. The superintendent of police said he had reason to believe that the prisoner was simulating to be deaf and dumb. The noble chairman said he was acquainted with the deaf and dumb alphabet, a knowledge he had acquired for judicial purposes, and he would test the prisoner. He then put the question to the prisoner by means of the digital alphabet, "What have you to say to the Bench?" The prisoner immediately responded on his fingers, "Nothing, but that I wish to be released, as I have committed no offence in law." The chairman replied, "Your petition is well written, and as it has not been shown that it is otherwise than a statement of facts, you are discharged." The prisoner, with digital emphasis, said, "You are the first magistrate I ever converse with a dumb man, and that I owe my discharge. I shall ever remember you with gratitude." The translation of the prisoner's answers by the chairman caused great laughter in court.

We stated last week that Mr. Macnamara, one of the railway commissioners, had resigned and withdrawn his resignation. This was incorrect. Mr. Macnamara never resigned.

THERE being only ten judges to do the work of the Spring Assizes in Ireland, the circuits have been so arranged that the home business is to be attended to by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas exclusively. The Connaught circuit is to be taken by Mr. Baron Deasy, without assistance.

THE GREAT TURF SWINDLE.—On Tuesday, in the Court of Session, Edinburgh, before Lord Curriehill, a case was decided in which the Clydesdale Banking Company wished to have it declared that they were only liable in once and single payment of any sum in their possession belonging to the defenders Yonge and others and Madame De Goncourt. The Banking Company were found successful in respect that there was no opposition, and were also found entitled to the expense of raising the action, as well as the expenses incurred in the English Bankruptcy Court.

LAW SOCIETIES.

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

THE Hon. Mr. Justice Field will preside at the ensuing annual festival of this association, which is fixed to take place on Wednesday, 6th June next, at the Albion Tavern. The learned judge having for some years practised as a solicitor in the city of London, we trust that this fact alone will operate as an inducement to solicitors to be present on the occasion, to support his Lordship in the chair.

LAW ASSOCIATION.

THE usual monthly meeting of the directors was held at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, on Thursday, the 1st inst., the following being present, viz., Mr. Deaborough (chairman), and Messrs. Carpenter, Collinson, Cronin, Kelly, Parkin, Sawtell, Sidney Smith, Styan, Tyles, and Boodle (secretary). Five non-members' cases were considered, but not any grants were made, the further consideration of the same being postponed till the April meeting. Two new members were elected, and the ordinary general business was transacted.

NOTE.—This department of the LAW TIMES, is contributed by EDWARD WALFORD, M.A., and late scholar of Balliol College, Oxford, and Fellow of the Genealogical and Historical Society of Great Britain; and, as it is desired to make it as perfect a record as possible, the families and friends of deceased members of the Profession will oblige by forwarding to the LAW TIMES Office any dates and materials required for a biographical notice.

R. SMART, ESQ.

THE late Robert Smart, Esq., solicitor, of Sunderland, who died on the 13th inst., at his residence in that town, in the eighty-ninth year of his age, was, until his retirement from the active duties of his profession a few years since, the eldest practising attorney in the county of Durham. Born in the year 1787, he was articled to Mr. Thomas Collin, of Sunderland, and was admitted an attorney and notary in Michaelmas 1810. He was a perpetual commissioner, a commissioner to administer oaths and for taking affidavits, and also held the conjoint office of clerk and treasurer to the Wearmouth Bridge Commissioners. The passing of the Borough of Sunderland Act 1851, extinguished one of the sole appointments which Mr. Smart then held, and thenceforward he may be said to have disappeared from public life. Mr. Smart married the eldest daughter of the late Rev. George Stephenson, rector of Redmarshall, county Durham, by whom he has left one son, Mr. Collin Smart, a solicitor, and also a daughter.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

LONDON.—HILARY SITTING, 1877.

Following lists contain the names of all the cases entered in the Common Law Divisions, which notice of trial has been given, up to recent time, and which stand for disposal at hall, in the city of London. In the official list cases appear in the order in which they stand down, whether for trial before Special or Common Juries. It occurs to us as more consistent to the profession that Special Jury cases be published in a separate list.

House Duty; but that exemption only extended to cases where no caretaker slept in the house at night. By 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, that exemption was extended to houses occupied for professional purposes. By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 11, any tenement occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only was made exempt, even though a servant or other person dwell in such tenement for the protection thereof. It will be observed that this further exemption to houses, dwelt in by a caretaker, was provided only for houses occupied for the purposes of trade only; but Mr. HERSHELL, Q.C., ingeniously argued that this section must be read by the light of 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, and must be taken to include houses occupied for professional purposes. His argument, however, though it prevailed with the commissioners, was overruled by the Judge of the Exchequer Division, who held that the house being partly occupied for professional purposes, and being occupied by a caretaker at night, was liable to assessment.

ORDER LIV., rule 6 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, provides that in the Common Law Divisions, every appeal to court from chambers shall be by motion, and shall be made within eight days after the decision appealed against. Order LIII., rule 4, provides that unless the court or a judge gives special leave to the contrary, there must be at least two clear days between the service of a notice of motion and the day named in the notice for hearing the motion. The Court of Appeal heard a few days ago a case (Deykin v. Coleman) in which the question was raised whether a notice of motion given for a dies non was a nullity. In Daubney v. Shuttleworth (L. Rep. 1 Ex. D. 53), a notice of motion was held to be bad upon the ground that it was for the day after the termination of the sittings. In Deykin v. Coleman the motion (under the 6th rule, Order LIV.) was not made within the eight days limited by the order. Thus there were two points before the court. The notice was declared to be bad upon the grounds that the appeal had been brought more than eight days after the decision in chambers without special leave; and, secondly, that the notice had not been specifically given for the day on which the motion was brought. This latter objection to the notice is practically the same with that in Daubney v. Shuttleworth. Hence it must not be assumed that notices of motion are merely intimations to the other side of an intention to move the court at any indefinite time, or that it does not matter what day is named in the notice. This is simply another way of saying that terms of the above rules must be observed.

THE case of Festing v. Allen (12 M. & Wel. 279) is a well-known authority on the subject of contingent remainders to a class of persons. In a case of Jull v. Jacobs (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 153; L. C. 3 Ch. Div. 703), decided in July last, Sir R. MALINS, V.C., had a doubt whether Festing v. Allen was not in the way of the decision he was then pronouncing, and said, "I consider that that case was properly overruled in a case which I argued before Vice-Chancellor STUART of Browne v. Browne (3 Sm. & Gif. 568). I believe it has been the subject of strife since. My opinion was always against Festing v. Allen, though it was the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, delivered by a very eminent judge, Lord CRANWORTH." Fortunately, for the decision of Sir R. MALINS in Jull v. Jacobs, Festing v. Allen had no bearing on it, since, under the circumstances, there was not, nor ever had been, any prior particular estate validly created, the life interest intended to have been created having been limited to one of the witnesses of the testator's will. The opinion, therefore, of Sir R. MALINS about Festing v. Allen must be regarded merely as a dictum. This dictum may be assessed at its real worth by the following extract from the judgment of Lord Justice JAMES in delivering the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cunliffe v. Bruncker (L. Rep. 3 Ch. Div. 393). The Lord Justice says: "We could not so hold without expressly overruling the case of Festing v. Allen, in which the point was apparently thought unarguable by most of the counsel engaged, in which it was argued by one counsel, and was put aside as not worthy of serious consideration by the Judges at common law and equity; and the case of Festing v. Allen has been from the time it was pronounced regarded as one of the leading authorities in real property law."

THE well-known principle that an agent cannot delegate his office, that is, where it is a power in the nature of a trust, or an authority clothed with a discretion, has been illustrated by the case of Cook v. Ward. It was a drainage case, and was tried last summer assizes at Lincoln, when a verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for 1s. damages. The motion came on in the Common Pleas Division not long since. A drainage board had power to appoint committees of its members to undertake the supervision of parts of its system. In the instance before us a committee of three was so appointed. Amongst themselves that each of them should look of the drain entrusted to their care which was nearest to his own house. A flood came; one of the committee took active steps. The others saw what he was doing, and approved of his conduct, leaving him to continue to act as he thought best. He then cut through an obstruction, the effect of which was to shift the inundation from one place to another, and in answer to the action brought against him by a person aggrieved, he pleaded authority. It was held that the power of the board, properly delegated to a committee under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, must be exercised by the committee acting together, and not by one of them alone. A verdict for 1s. damages was accordingly ordered to be entered for the plaintiff. In giving judgment the learned Judge said that, if the power had been intended to be capable of being re-delegated to a single member of the committee, express words to that effect should have been made use of. This case is important in these days, when the management of municipal affairs has in so many places passed beyond the control of single individuals.

THE nature of a schoolmaster's contract with the parent of his pupil was the subject of discussion in the Common Pleas Division, on the 18th ult., in a case of Watson v. Simeon, before Mr. Justice DENMAN, sitting alone. Our knowledge of the case is limited to the short statement of it contained in the Law Journal Notes of Cases of the 27th ult., the point decided being that a parent who, in consequence of the illness of his child, had kept him from school for a term, was not bound to pay for the term. Probably this will be a surprise to most people, and a disagreeable surprise to schoolmasters; and, in truth, we find considerable difficulty in accepting the learned Judge's ruling. We apprehend that it is implied in the ordinary contract between a parent and the master of a so-called boarding school that payment according to a fixed annual rate is to be made by the parent to the master so long as the relation of master and pupil continues. In the case of illness of the pupil it seems to us that as a matter of strict law the schoolmaster is not absolved from the duty of taking charge of the pupil and of supplying him with all needful medicine and nursing, being entitled, as a general rule to be recouped all moneys so expended as extras. If the parent, instead of electing to pay for such extras, arranges that the pupil shall remain during his illness at home, we venture to think that this is an arrangement for the benefit and satisfaction of the parent, and that the schoolmaster, who is bound to keep a vacancy for the return of his pupil on his recovery, and who is ready and willing to receive him as soon as the parent thinks fit to send him back, is clearly entitled to be recompensed in the same manner as if the pupil had attended school in the ordinary way.

THE reform of the magistracy is a subject of wide interest, and one in which all classes of the community are more or less interested. Not long ago, it will be in the recollection of our readers, we referred to certain projected reforms, one of the main characteristics of which was that there should be an increase in the number of trained lawyers. In our remarks upon this suggestion we gave it our support chiefly upon the ground that a knowledge of the principles of the laws of evidence is of prime necessity in every person placed in a judicial position, and that this knowledge cannot be otherwise than uncommon in the ranks of the unpaid magistracy. The value of this suggestion is not, however, universally acknowledged, and it would be vain to expect such unanimity of opinion. Some days ago Mr. CROMPTON, a speaker at Sheffield, went at some length into the question of the reform of the laws relating to summary conviction. Betler guarantees of the efficiency of the magistrates, he thought, were urgently wanted; but such guarantees would not be afforded by the appointment of stipendiaries. Such a scheme merely meant the scattering of a number of fourth-rate lawyers all over the country. Purely official justice was retrograde; besides, stipendiaries had not such influence in patching up quarrels as respected local magistrates. All criminal justice, maintained the speaker, should be carried out by a proper combination of official legal capacity on the one hand, with popular voluntary common sense on the other. The misfortune of this suggestion is that it is a suggestion of the union of two unknown quantities. If it means anything definite, it appears to mean that every Petty Sessions should have the advantage of the assistance of a trained lawyer, a proposition which would probably satisfy even the most determined and prejudiced assailants of justices' justice. The first requisite in a stipendiary is that he should be able to estimate the value of the evidence adduced before him. Doubtless it would be a highly desirable result if all Magistrates were first-rate lawyers, and capable, so far as legal qualifications were concerned, of exchanging duties with the Judges of the Supreme Court, but no one gifted with the common sense invoked by Mr. CROMPTON expects to find any such state of things. In spite, however, of the speaker's objection to the extension of the system of paid magistrates, his conclusion is that there should be an infusion of one or more of the best stipendiaries into each county, that some restrictive qualifications for justices of the peace should be adopted, and that there should be the case before the Master of the Rolls, the fund out of which maintenance was directed was a residue, and although the learned Judge is reported to say that "When property is held in trust for an infant contingently, on his attaining twenty-one, the infant, if he attains that age, will get both" corpus and income (a proposition true of residuary personalty, or a share thereof (Trevanion v. Vivian, 2 Ves. Senr. 430), and of realty blended with personalty (Genery v. Fitzgerald, Jac. 468), but, except in cases within the 26th section, not generally true, since it is clear law that a contingent gift of realty, or a contingent general or pecuniary legacy does not carry rents or interest) yet there can be little doubt, from the comprehensive view taken by Sir George Jessel, that he would have treated a general legacy equally with a residue as coming within the scope of the section.

We have no doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Re Cotton. Lord Cranworth's Act was intended partly to shorten deeds, settlements, and wills; partly to supply omissions occurring in them of such a nature as might reasonably be presumed to have arisen per incuriam. Thus in every well drawn settlement or will giving real or personal estate to infants, whether the corpus was to vest instantly and absolutely, or sub modo, or contingently, a power of maintenance was inserted, together with a direction that the income, or the surplus income, subject to the exercise of the power, should be accumulated for the benefit of the infant legatee or other person ultimately entitled to the corpus.

A decision of Sir R. Malins, in Re George, on the 19th Dec. last (25 W. Rep. 182), as to what is sufficient to exclude the application of the 26th section, would, if it were law, greatly narrow the operation of the Act. Sir R. Malins there held that where a testator specially gives a fund for the maintenance of an infant legatee, to whom he also gives a pecuniary legacy contingent on the legatee attaining twenty-one, that the legatee is not entitled to further maintenance out of the intermediate income of the contingent legacy by force of Lord Cranworth's Act, or otherwise, even although the testator be the parent of, or in loco parentis to, the legatee. Probably, apart from Lord Cranworth's Act, the legatee would not be entitled, having regard to the cases cited by the Vice Chancellor, but fortified by the decision of Sir C. Hall, on the 19th ult., on the same words in the same will (Weekly Note, the 27th Jan.) we do not hesitate to say that the view of Sir R. Malins, that Lord Cranworth's Act had no application to the case before him, is quite untenable.

The 26th section, it will be observed, provides not merely for the maintenance of an infant (whether child or stranger), but for the destination of the income not so applied. It in fact supplies directions for this purpose in accordance with the express powers and trusts usually inserted by conveyancers. If the section had dealt solely with the maintenance of infants, we should still have been of opinion that as there was no express declaration to exclude its operation, it would have been going a great deal too far to hold that a direction for maintenance out of one fund was sufficient to negative the allowance of auxiliary maintenance out of another fund. There would be no such incompatibility as in a remedial act would warrant the application of the maxim "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." When, however, other and most important incidents beyond the mere provision for maintenance are annexed by the section to an infant's legacy, it seems to us reasonably plain that the exclusion of the operation of the section, must be effected by some clear and almost necessary implication. Such an implication does not we think arise from the bare fact that maintenance (which may or may not be of adequate amount) has been specially given by the same will out of another fund. Let us look for a moment at the effect of the section on the destination of the income or surplus income ultra the maintenance, and how widely in many cases it differs from what such destination would otherwise be. We will take by way of illustration three classes of cases, first, a gift vested instantly, but liable to be divested on a contingency; secondly, a contingent gift of real estate or a contingent general as distinguished from a specific or residuary bequest; thirdly, a gift debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro.

Now in the first class of cases by the operation of the Act, and in the event of the contingency failing, the infant is deprived of the intermediate surplus income and accumulations thereof in favour of the person ultimately entitled to the corpus, for, apart from the Act, the infant would be entitled to such income, Taylor v. Johnson (2 P. Williams, 504), which has been repeatedly followed. In the second class of cases, and in the event of the contingency happening, the section deprives the heir or person entitled to the general or residuary estate of the intermediate income, in favour of the infant, since, apart from the Act, the gift would not carry rents and profits or interest until the contingency happened: (Hopkins v. Hopkins, Ca. T. Talbot, 228, as corrected by Countess of Bective v. Hodgson, 10 H. of L. Cas. 656; Descrombes v. Tomkins, 1 Cox 133.) In the third class of cases, similarly, the infant would, by the section, be benefited at the expense of the general estate, as it has long since been settled, that though a legacy be vested, if the time for payment has not arrived, interest does not run until the time for payment.

att v. Dolby (3 Vesey 10).

We apprehend that these highly important results of an Act, which annexes to gifts to infants, incidents corresponding with those which conveyancers were in the habit of annexing by means of special provisions, are not to be set aside by slight circumstances or doubtful inferences.

AGENCY—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO THIRD PARTIES —WHERE THE AGENT ACTS UNDER A MISTAKE AS TO THE EXISTENCE OF AUTHORITY. (a)

THE cases in which a person who professes to act as agent, but who has no authority so to act, are reducible to two classes:

(A) He may have never had authority. This class again is divisible into two sub-divisions:

- (a) He may be aware that he has no authority, or
- (b) He may act under the influence of bonâ fide belief that he has such authority.

(B) He may have had full authority originally.

In a considered judgment of the Court of Exchequer delivered in 1842 (Smout v. Ilbury, 10 M. & W. 1), it was said with reference to the liability of agents who act without authority, though they honestly supposed they had authority, that there is a class of cases in which the courts have held that where a party making a contract as agent bonâ fide believes that such authority is vested in him, but has in fact no such authority, he is personally liable, although he was not actuated by any fraudulent motives, nor made any statement which he knew to be untrue. The reason given was that it is a wrong differing only in degree, but not in its essence, from the cases where the agent knows his want of authority, "to state as true what the individual making such statement does not know to be true, even though he does not know it to be false, but believes without sufficient grounds, that the statement will ultimately turn out to be correct." The court goes on to say, "And if that wrong produces injury to a third person, who is wholly ignorant of the grounds on which such belief of the supposed agent is founded, and who has relied on the correctness of his assertion, it is equally just that he who makes such assertion should be personally liable for its consequences." Clearly, then, the fact that a person assumes to act as agent owing to an honest mistake, was not, in the opinion of the court, any ground to free him from liability.

The test, in the opinion of the court, whether a person whose assumption of authority was due to an honest mistake is liable for the consequences of his want of authority was whether or not he has stated as true what he did not know to be true, omitting at the same time to give such information to the other contracting party, as would enable him equally with himself to judge as to the authority under which he proposed to act.

As illustrations of the principle that it is no defence for a defendant to say that he acted under an honest belief that he had authority, it will be sufficient to cite the following cases:

Randell v. Trimen (18 C. B. 786), heard in 1856, was an action for a false and fraudulent misrepresentation. The declaration stated that the defendant, who was employed as an architect by A. and others to superintend the building of a church, falsely and fraudulently represented and pretended that he was authorised by A. to order and did order, stone of the plaintiffs for the building of the said church, for and on account of A., and that the plaintiff, relying on that representation, and believing that the defendant had authority from A. to order the stone on his account, delivered the same, and it was used in building the church; whereas the defendant was not, as he well knew, authorised to order the same. There was another averment that A., refusing to pay for the stone, the plaintiff, trusting in the defendant's representation, sued A. for the price, but failed in the action, and had to pay the costs. Mr. Justice Crowder, before whom the case was tried, told the jury that if they believed that the defendant represented that he had the authority of the person named to order the stone in his name, and that that representation was untrue, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the price of the stone, and also the whole taxed costs of the former action. A rule for a new trial was discharged. It was argued in support of the rule that the defendant, being honestly mistaken, could not be held liable for misrepresentation. The Lord Chief Justice, however, intimated that such a view was wrong, and distinguished Smout v. Ilbury (10 M. & W. 1), on the ground that the defendant in that case had made no representation at all.

In Godwin v. Francis (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 295), decided in 1870, the defendant and four others being jointly interested in an estate, were desirous of settling the property. An advertisement was issued with the intimation "To treat and view the property, application to be made to (amongst others) Mr. B. Francis (the defendant). The plaintiff, after the appearance of the advertisement, wrote to the defendant offering him £10,000 for the estate; the defendant asked £11,000. After some correspondence, during which the plaintiff offered £10,500, the plaintiff received the following telegram:

(a) By WILLIAM EVANS, Esq., of the South Wales Circuit.

"The following telegram has been received . . . from Berry Francis to Charles Godwin :

"Your offer for the Liddington estate is accepted; confirm yours by first post."

Upon its receipt the plaintiff sent the confirmation. This was on the 23rd Oct. 1867. The abstract of title was sent to the plaintiffs' solicitor on the 29th Oct. On the 8th Nov. the plaintiff was informed by the solicitors of the supposed vendors that the defendant had acted without authority. The plaintiff sued the vendors, and, continuing the action after they had sworn in answer to interrogatories that the defendant had no authority, assuming that they were bound under the terms of their advertisement, was nonsuited. The plaintiff then brought an action against Francis for misrepresentation of authority, and claimed damages to the amount of £726 10s. 6d., a sum made up of the following items :

Costs of investigating title .....	£27	11	6
Loss of bargain .....	200	0	0
Costs paid to the former defendant...	173	14	0
Costs of Francis .....	64	1	0
Plaintiff's own costs in same action	161	4	0
Loss on re-sale of stock .....	100	0	0
	£726 10 6

At the trial a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, subject to a question whether there was a valid contract under the Statute of Frauds, and to a motion to reduce the damages, the court to draw inferences of fact.

The first question having been decided in the affirmative, the Court of Common Pleas decided that the defendant was liable to pay :

1. The cost of investigating the title.
2. The costs incurred and paid by the plaintiff in the action against the vendors down to the time when the answers to the interrogatories had been received and considered by the plaintiff's legal advisers. (See Spedding v. Nevell, L. Rep. 4 O. P. 212).
3. The difference between the contract price and the market price of the estate—the sum for which it was sold being prima facie evidence of the latter. (See Engell v. Fitch, L. Rep. 4, Q. B. 659).

The loss on the re-sale of stock which had been bought without notice to the defendant, and before the title had been investigated or possession of the land given, was held to be too remote.

The defendant's liability on the first point was admitted; his liability upon the second point was put on the ground that in the position in which he was placed by the defendant, it was reasonable for the plaintiff to commence proceedings against the vendors, and that this course continued reasonable until the answers to the interrogatories left no room to doubt what the evidence at the trial would be. By relying on the advertisements after the interrogatories were answered, he acted upon a wrong view of the law, and not upon any mistake as to the authority conferred in fact upon the defendant. (See per Chief Justice Bovill.) The plaintiff was also entitled to recoup himself for what he lost by the contract not being fulfilled. In the present case, that was the difference between the contract price and market price, though it is quite conceivable that the damages under this head might possibly have been nil, e.g., in the event of bankruptcy of the vendors, (see per Mr. Justice M. Smith (sup.), and per Mr. Justice Blackburn in Richardson v. Williamson, L. Rep. 6, Q. B. 279), since a third party who contracts with an authorised agent can recover from him only what he would be entitled to recover from the vendors, if the defendant had had the authority he warranted, and the vendors refused to perform. #### LAW LIBRARY.

A Short Guide to the Preparation of Bills of Costs, with Precedents in all the Divisions of the High Courts of Justice; also Precedents of Costs in Conveyancing, Probate, and Administration. By A BILL CLERK. London: Waterlow and Sons (Limited).

This book speaks for itself. That it will prove of use to solicitors is beyond a doubt; but seeing that its chief value is in the precedents for costs in the Common Law Divisions of the High Court, it is almost a pity that it was not offered to the profession twelve months ago, when London solicitors, at all events, were much more in want of such a book than they are now. Plaintiffs' costs in an action for slander are especially well drawn, and have, we gather from the preface, been "taken from taxed bills." It is to be wished that this were so in every case, especially in Chancery actions, in regard to which, taxations of costs, under the Judicature Acts, have been comparatively few. As to the precedent in an action for slander, on page 96, we notice that 2s. is the sum stated to be paid on issuing a subpoena ad test. This should be 2s. 6d. Then on page 97 we read "instructions for brief £1 ls." A note should have been added that this charge varies according to the number of witnesses and other circumstances. We do not find any allowance for notice to witnesses to attend before the referee. As to precedent No. 15 relating to "plaintiff's costs under Order XVI., rule 1, appeal from master's order," a sum of £2 4s. 6d. is allowed to counsel without comment. Attention ought to have been directed to Order XIV. under "special allowances and general provisions" in the additional rules of August 1875, which directs that no costs are to be allowed for attendance of counsel at chambers unless the judge specially certifies. In the same precedent (15) we find the costs allowed of an affidavit of plaintiff in reply to defendant's affidavit. Costs of a plaintiff's affidavit in reply are not usually allowed. Copy reply on page 109 is charged 1s., it should be 2d. per folio as in the case of like copies of other pleadings. Precedent No. 18 (plaintiff's costs on order to stay) discloses some imperfections; close copies of a party's own pleadings are not usually allowed, and while such a charge is improperly made, in the case before us, strange to say a close copy of the statement of defence which would be allowed, is not charged. However, the above objections and a few others which we notice, are not of importance, and we have no hesitation in recommending this little book to solicitors' clerks.

The Practice of the Supreme Court of Judicature and of the House of Lords on Appeal, &c., &c. By LOCOCK WEBB, Q. C. London: Butterworth.

THIS is a work of undoubted merit, and is in every way superior to the books of practice under the Judicature Acts, already published. The scope of the volume is correctly stated in the preface as a "complete work on the practice under the Judicature Acts 1873 and 1875 (as amended), and the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876; and on the procedure of the Supreme Court upon appeals from the several courts, to the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court, and also on appeals to the House of Lords. The book contains all the rules and orders under the Judicature Acts, and the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, down to the commencement of the year 1877; and also the Winter Assizes Act 1876, and orders thereunder, and the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1876. Every reported decision in court upon the Acts and rules of any present practical value is (it is believed) referred to."

We congratulate Mr. Webb on the fact that he has not adopted the rôle of a bookmaker. With the aid of several competent assistants, he gives to the profession a pithy treatise on Jurisdiction, Law, and Procedure. Some of what may be called the brief essays on the different heads embraced, are models of concise statement, whilst others are not so clear as might be wished, and are rather too detailed in their statement of cases.

Mr. Webb has thought that it was unnecessary to cite any of the decisions at Judges' Chambers. We agree that many of those decisions have ceased to have much, if any, value; but there are, undoubtedly, some which may still be usefully consulted. For example, Order XVI. rule 17, has received a more liberal interpretation than might have been looked for, because Mr. Justice Lindley read it together with sect. 24, sub-sect 3: (Bitt. P. C. 102, referred to in Lely and Foulkes' Judicature Acts, 2nd edit. p. 139.) And other cases might be mentioned, particularly with reference to procedure or bills of exchange. Opinions, however, may well differ on this point. Perhaps Mr. Webb has acted wisely in confining himself to decisions in Court.

This volume must prove a most welcome addition to the library of the judge and the practitioner.

NEW EDITIONS.

MESSRS. LELY AND FOULKES have issued a second edition of the work upon the Judicature Acts and orders (H. Sweet). It contains the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and all the decided cases up to the end of the year.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

IN regard to the common law judges' chambers it is urged against us that while we have condemned in strong language—warranted by the circumstances—the miserable arrangements made there for the dispatch of business, and for the convenience, or rather, we ought to say, the inconvenience, of the Profession, yet that we do not insist upon any well-devised scheme of improvements. We certainly do not admit that we are not at liberty to expose evils without incurring the responsibility of suggesting suitable remedies for such evils. However, we have often thrown out suggestions which, if adopted, would in our opinion work a great improvement. The plan adopted in the Chancery Chambers we have more than once pointed to with approval. These chambers are presided over by solicitors whose practical training gives them an advantage over the common law masters, who possess very little, if any, practical experience of a character enabling them to work out a system for conducting business in keeping with present requirements. But further, let the suggestion made on this subject in our last issue, page 222, be acted on, and let us ask this question, what reason is there that the business of a day should be crowded into two or three hours of time? Why are all summonses issued for the same time of day and at the same place? Nothing would be easier than to issue different kinds of summonses, returnable at different hours of the day, regulated partly for the convenience of solicitors themselves, and partly according to the nature of the action and summons, or each summons and copy should bear a number, of which say fifty should be allotted to every hour, from ten till four. Solicitors' common law clerks would soon ascertain at what time of day they should issue their summons in order to have it returnable at a time convenient to them. We are persuaded that an excellent system could with care and attention be evolved from some such plan as this. We, however, have long since learnt that the most rotten system of transacting business usually enjoys a prolonged existence after the evils of such a system has been exposed and denounced over and over again. And those solicitors who are really determined to force on a substantial reform in connection with the arrangements and business at the common law judges' chambers may take it from us, that their only chance of success is by keeping up a constant attack upon the present system. This done it is possible that a decided improvement may be accomplished in say the next year or two. Above all we recommend united efforts, in which the Council of the Incorporated Law Society should take the lead.

A NEW practice is insisted on at the Common Law Judges' Chambers as regards judges' summonses, which can hardly be said to be an improvement upon that which formerly obtained. It is now necessary to enter the name of the action in connection with the summons to be disposed of on a daily list of summonses and ex parte applications, a separate list being reserved for summonses attended by counsel, and the following is an instance of the working of the would-be improved system: A summons appears on the list for, say, Wednesday, No. 19 in the list, and not having been reached, the common law clerk, whose summons we are dealing with, proceeded to enter it in the next day's list, where it appeared No. 52 in that list. In other words, contrary to all reason, the arrears of one day is not placed at the top of the list for the next day; and the jumble may be further explained by the fact that many common law clerks, in order to counteract this practice, adopt the plan of entering their summons on the lists of two days, so that if not reached one day it may come on early the next day, and the result of this contrivance is that a case may be disposed of late on one day and yet figure early in the list for the next day, thus upsetting the calculations of other clerks as to about what time a particular summons is likely to be reached. A case is reported to us of an application ex parte for a writ of capias under sect. 6 of the Debtors' Act 1869, in which it was alleged that the defendant was about to leave the country, and the plaintiff's solicitor was only able under this new system to get before the judge after attending three days at chambers. Matters are not improved by the absence of a chamber clerk representing Mr. Justice Hawkins, who has been attending chambers during the past week. These chambers are now to be seen at their best, or rather their worst, when, about half-past twelve, a sudden influx of counsel, anxious to get before the judge, adds to the crowd of clerks already waiting, and makes confusion worse confounded. The system of daily lists of summonses as at present carried out is worse than useless. We understand that the arrears at the present time of summons issued and attended by the judge, and attended number of about fifty, and there is also an arrears of like summonses not attended by counsel. In other words, the business of suitors suffers, and solicitors and their clerks experience a most serious delay and inconvenience, partly because there is only one judge at chambers instead of three. While writing in regard to chamber business, we may add that we are sorry to learn it now frequently happens in the Chancery Chambers that matters appointed to be heard at 11.30 are not reached for sometimes two hours afterwards.

WHEN the Judicature Acts first came into operation all judgments after verdict and special judgments were prepared by the clerks in the judgment offices of the three Common Law Divisions. As may have been expected, however, arrears soon accumulated, and it was found necessary to leave solicitors to prepare their own judgment papers, and in almost every case printed forms can now be obtained, in which it is only necessary to embody the finding of the jury, as set out in the associate's certificate, where actions proceed to trial, or as the case may be. As a consequence, the necessary allowance for this extra work is now sanctioned by the common law taxing masters.

A POINT of Chancery practice is suggested to us as doubtful which we should have thought was settled long ago, namely, whether personal service of the decree in an administration suit upon infants and married women is absolutely necessary and indispensable before an order may be applied for giving leave for such parties to attend the proceedings. That such orders have frequently been made without the service in question is beyond a doubt. We have heard of a case of over two hundred persons interested in an estate being administered in Chancery, and most of whom were infants or married women, in which the costs of service of a copy of the decree on each of them was avoided by a firm of solicitors accepting service on their behalf, and obtaining the necessary order.

HOWEVER just may be the complaint that it is time the fee of 6s. 8d. gave place to a more liberal allowance for professional services rendered by solicitors of a character like to those for which the above fee is usually, and has for a long series of years, been allowed, it is manifest, from the high salaries which are frequently paid to solicitors who fill the various municipal public appointments in England and Wales, that the worth of the services of solicitors, not only as lawyers, but also as men of business, is beginning to be estimated at its true figure. The most recent case evidencing this is furnished by the action of the Glasgow Corporation, which body has just increased the salary of its town clerk (a solicitor) to £2500 per annum. This is nearly £300 a year more than the salary of the Lord Advocate of Scotland; £1500 a year more than the salaries of the President of the Board of Trade and the President of the Local Government Board; it exceeds by a similar amount the salaries of the Comptroller-General of the Exchequer and Auditor-General; the Chairman of Customs, the Chairman of Inland Revenue, and it is £1000 a year more than the emoluments of the Postmaster-General. This salary is not, however, in any way out of proportion to the increasing responsibility and labour which devolves upon the learned town clerk of Glasgow. Some large corporations will do well to consider whether their town clerks are sufficiently remunerated.

A MEMBER of the Bar, in writing to the Times on the subject of "The law's delay," of which we hear much more now, and rightly so than under the old procedure, says, speaking, we presume, of the evil effects upon the legal business of the country, caused by the monopoly of a central Bar, "Things are very bad now, and, that being so, it is useless for us to talk of our culture and learning. If culture and learning will not do the work well which the country requires, then the country must get something else to do it; and the energy of the solicitors clamouring outside must come in to have their trial." It is very true, though plain speaking that solicitors are "clamouring outside," and we are convinced that if solicitors only "come in to have their trial" (not a very elegant mode of expressing one's meaning), it will contribute greatly to those substantial reforms in our judicature, by the side of which the Judicature Acts will present a very diminutive appearance. Great changes are coming—it is no matter of prophecy—the shadows of "coming events" are already visible. Subject to certain necessary restrictions, and a right of removal for trial to London, all actions founded on contract will be left to local courts for disposal, and, as a consequence, we shall hear no more about "the monopoly of the Bar," a "Barristers' Fee Bill," "Tribunals of Commerce," and other agitations for reform in the Profession. We should be sorry to disparage the "traditions" and "honour and dignity" of the Bar, but we are convinced that these and personal considerations impair the mental vision of a large number of capable lawyers in the House of Commons, who are in truth sacrificing the best interests of the country by impeding or altogether stopping the accomplishment of those legal reforms which to less prejudiced minds are found to be essential to the commercial and general prosperity of the empire. Local business must be disposed of in local courts, and the Superior Court must—except in appeal cases—be left free to adjudicate upon cases of imperial importance or universal concern.

IN another column we publish the annual report of the committee of the Wolverhampton Law Association and Library. The two striking features of this report are the efforts which are being made, and with success, to form a law library in Wolverhampton, and the reference to the provisions of sect. 8 of 23 & 24 Vict. cap. 127, as to dispensing with the preliminary examination before entering into articles of clerkship. In the resolution of the committee upon this subject we entirely concur. The wholesale way in which orders dispensing with this examination have been granted must, if possible, be put a stop to. We also publish elsewhere a report of the annual meeting of the Birmingham Law Society, which will interest solicitors.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times (a barrister, makes "a serious charge against solicitors," which is in effect that the solicitors for each party in an action allow all the costs to be incurred, even to delivering briefs, knowing very well that the subject matter in dispute cannot be disposed of by judge and jury, but must be referred—as, for instance, a disputed builder's account. It often happens that clients will not consent to a reference; but we admit that the complaint here made is well founded in some cases among a certain class of practitioners, and while we dislike indulging in a tu quoque argument, we cannot but regret the readiness of counsel to receive briefs and fees in such cases, knowing all the while that the case cannot go to trial.

WE are glad to be able to announce a further addition to the roll of solicitors who are justices of the peace. The Mayor of Bootle (Mr. Alderman T. P. Danson) has received from the office of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster the new commission of the peace for this borough, with the names of ten gentlemen chosen to form the first magisterial bench. Among the gentlemen whose names are enrolled on this new commission we find Mr. W. Barrall and Mr. J. Quinn, both solicitors of the Supreme Court practising at Bootle, but not as advocates of the local courts. Ten justices have been chosen, because that number is necessary to enable the bench to grant and confirm new licences for public houses. Had not that number been appointed, the county magistrates resident within the district must have co-operated with the borough justices, with whom even now they have concurrent jurisdiction; but, inasmuch as the newly-constituted authority is complete, and is vested with all the powers and jurisdiction of a full bench of borough magistrates, it is hardly probable that any of the county justices resident in the district will in any way interfere with the new bench.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ARTICLED CLERK—SERVICE UNDER ARTICLES.—INTERUPTION OF SERVICE—COMPLETION OF TERM AFTER EXPIRATION OF ARTICLES—6 & 7 VICT. c. 73 s. 3.—In Sept. 1870, a clerk was article to his father, a solicitor, for five years, and served under those articles up to Oct. 1873, when his father assigned his services to D. for fifteen months, and, having served D. for that period, the clerk returned to his father and served under the original articles until Sept. 1875. The Court of Queen's Bench having held that the service with D. could not be reckoned as part of the period of five years' service required by the statute, the clerk served his father for fifteen months further, but without fresh articles. Held, that the clerk had not duly served under a contract in writing as required by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 3, and that he must enter into fresh articles for fifteen months, and complete such service, before he could be admitted, but that, under the circumstances, he might be allowed to go in for the final examination. (Ex parte Adams, 35 L.T. Rep. N. S. 751. Chan. Div.)

TRIAL BY JURY—ACTION IN CHANCERY DIVISION.—Under the new practice a judge of the Chancery Division cannot try a case with a jury, but when an action in the Chancery Division has been ordered to be tried before a judge with a jury, it must be set down in the general list to be tried before a judge of one of the common law divisions,

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

Inquiries, as to Students' Debating Societies, as to the several Examinations, and as to Admission on the Roll of the Supreme Court, as to being called to the Bar, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, should be addressed to the Editor (Students' Department).

THAT the United Law Students' Society numbers among its members many capable men is not to be doubted. If confirmation were wanting, it may be found in a perusal of The Articled Clerk's Handbook, just published by Stephens and Sons, London, the useful and instructive work of Mr. S. Ward and Mr. J. S. Rubinstein, both recently admitted solicitors, and active members of the society, the latter filling the office of hon. secretary. No articled clerk should be without this little book. Then again, we have just received, in pamphlet form, the Davis Prize Essay for 1876, written by Mr. E. C. Rawlings, an active member of the committee of this society, the subject of the essay being, "The best system of land transfer," which is well worth a careful perusal. This is also published by Stevens and Sons. The Handbook we shall again refer to.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed to be delivered and held in the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, during the ensuing week: Monday, Conveyancing Class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock p.m.; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, ditto; Thursday, lecture on Equity, 6 to 7 o'clock p.m. Subscribers are not admitted to the hall after lectures have commenced.

ARTICLES of clerkship, or assignments of articles of clerkship, dated on any day during February, must be enrolled and registered at the Petty Bag Office on or before the same days in the month of August next, and when articles or assignments are required to be, and are, enrolled and registered on any day during the month of February, they must be produced and entered at the Law Institution on or before the same day of the month of May next. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 8 and 9, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 7. Failure to comply with these statutory requirements often entails a loss of time upon articled students.

WHERE articles expire between the 9th April and 22nd May, candidates may be examined on the 24th and 25th April next; and if between the 21st May and 2nd Nov., may be examined on the 19th and 20th June next; or, of course, at any subsequent examination. Six weeks' notice at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of the month of examination.

AN examination certificate is only available for admission on the roll of the Supreme Court within six months from its date, and must otherwise be specially enlarged by an order of the Master of the Rolls, which should be applied for at the Petty Bag Office.

NOTICES for the final examination, and notices for admission on the roll of solicitors can be renewed within one week from the end of the month, for which such original notices have respectively been given. For further information see the Regulations of November 1875.

BOLTON ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

THIS society held its fourth ordinary meeting for this session on Wednesday, 31st Jan. last, at the Law Society's rooms, Wood-street, when there was a large attendance of members. Mr. Cullen took the chair. An instructive essay on "Mortgages of Fixtures and Registration" was read by Mr. Cannon, of Bolton, solicitor, one of the vice-presidents of the society, after which the case of Ex parte Daglish, re Wild (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108) was debated upon, the question being, "Was the case rightly decided?" Mr. Chambers opened the debate in the affirmative, and was supported by Mr. Pennington. Messrs. French and Ninnell opposed their view, and the discussion was taken part in by other of the members. Mr. Cannon also speaking on the subject. The question was decided by the meeting in the affirmative by a majority of eight.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held in the secretary's office, 2, Lawson-street, on Friday evening last. Mr. T. E. Mansfield in the chair. The subject for discussion was "A devise to A. for life, gift over on his being declared a bankrupt. A was afterwards adjudged bankrupt, but before a trustee was appointed or claim made to the property, the bankruptcy was annulled. Does the gift over take effect?" Mr. J. C. Hemingway opened the evening's debate in the affirmative, and was supported by Messrs. Henry Walker and S. Jeavons. Mr. J. Higginson argued for the negative, and was supported by Mr. R. D. Duncan. The following cases were cited: For the affirmative, Freeman v. Bowen, 35 Bev. 17; Montefiore v. Behrens, L. Rep. 1 Eq. 171; and Cox v. Ponblanque, 37 L. T. Rep. Ch. 622. For the negative, White v. Chitty, 35 L. T. Rep. Ch. 343; Lloyd v. Lloyd, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 722; and Trappes v. Meredith, 39 L. T. Rep. Ch. 366, and Ch. 727 on appeal. Mr. Hemingway having replied, the question was put to the meeting, when the affirmative was carried by a small majority.

The next meeting will be held in the secretary's office, on Wednesday evening the 14th instant. Subject for discussion, "A lease to B. for years. The lease contains a covenant that B. shall not assign without the license of A. B. afterwards, without the license of A. bequeaths the term by his will and dies. "That such a bequest is a forfeiture of the lease." Mr. R. D. Duncan will argue for the affirmative, and Mr. S. E. Mansfield for the negative. Mr. J. H. Thompson, solicitor, will take the chair.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A GENERAL meeting of the members of this society was held on Monday, the 29th ult., at the County Court, when J. W. Piercy occupied the chair.

The chairman explained the provisions of the Acts of the last session of Parliament appointed for that evening's consideration, viz., The Bankers' Books Evidence Act, the Winter Assizes Act, and the Crossed Cheques Act (39 & 40 Vict. ch. 48, 57, and 81). He commented briefly on the history of each Act, the nature of the changes it made in the pre-existing law, and the expediency of change. A general discussion of a conversational character ensued, in which most of the members took part. Mr. Priestly then opened in the affirmative, a discussion on the question, "An estate in fee is limited to a married for her separate use. Can she convey to a purchaser the legal estate without the concurrence of her husband, and without acknowledgment?" Mr. Hastings opposed, and after a full and animated discussion the question was decided in the affirmative by the casting vote of the chairman.

LIVERPOOL LAW STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION.

THE third meeting this session was held on Monday, Feb. 5, at the Law Library, Cork-street, E. H. Blease, Esq., in the chair. The following was the subject for discussion: "A sends an offer by post to B. to sell him certain goods; B. accepts the offer by letter, and puts it into the post. The letter is lost in transmission by the post office and A. never receives it. A. having sold the goods to C., can B. sue A. for breach of contract?" Mr. St. J. Sparrow argued in the affirmative and Mr. H. Bremner in the negative. A very animated debate took place, in which Messrs. Melhuish, F. A. Lowndes, Broadbridge, Lighthound, W. Sparrow, Rogers, and the chairman, the chair being filled for the time by the secretary. In the course of the discussion the following cases were cited: Adams v. Lindell, 1 B. Ald. 681; Potter v. Saunders, 6 Hare, 1; Finucane's case, 17 W. R. 813; Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225; 18 L. J. 310, C. P.; Pellati's case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 527; Levita's case, L.

Rep. 3 Ch. App., 36; Gunn's case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 40; Sahlgreen and Carrall's cases, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 327; Hebbs case, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 19; British and American Telegraph Company (Limited) v. Colson, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 108; Townsend's case, L. Rep. 13 Eq. 148; Harris's case, L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 537; Relph's case, L. Rep. 11 Eq. 86; Wall's case, L. Rep. 15 Eq. 18; Pollock on Contracts, p. 16. Mr. St. J. Sparrow having replied, the question was put to the meeting by the chairman, and decided in favour of the negative by a majority of two. There were twenty-seven members present.

NEWPORT (MON.) LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

ON Wednesday, the 31st Jan., at a meeting of the above society, F. J. Justice, Esq., in the chair, the following moot point was discussed, viz.: "A. is the owner of a leasehold interest in a house, and by a codicil to his will, after reciting the lease under which he holds, bequeaths the house, and all his estate and interest therein, unto B. for all the residue of the term of ninety-nine years therein. A. subsequently purchases the freehold interest, and dies without having altered his will or codicil. Does B. take any interest?" Messrs. Oliver and David having opened on the affirmative and negative sides, the following members took part in the discussion which followed, viz.: Messrs. Farr, Newman, Llewellyn, Jacobs, Gibbs, Evans, and Gething. The leaders of the discussion having replied, the chairman summed up the arguments and put the question to the vote, when seven voted for the affirmative and four for the negative, thus giving a majority of three for the affirmative. This was one of the most successful meetings the society has held. At the next meeting the secretary intends moving a resolution to the effect that this society connect itself with the United Law Students' Society, in order that the members may have the advantages to be derived from the union of the societies.

MANCHESTER LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

THE sixth ordinary meeting of this session was held at Cross-street chambers on the 30th Jan. last. John Addison, Esq., B.A., Barrister-at-Law, Recorder of Preston, had consented to preside, but was unavoidably absent, his place being filled by Thomas Hudson Jordan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. The subject for the evening was the moot trial of Francis Tomkins, plaintiff, v. Thomas Jackson, defendant, being an imaginary action for slander. The chairman discharged the duties of judge, and the jury was composed of those members of the society who were present and not engaged in the case. Present: Messrs. Hill, Hielop, Watts, Williams, Atkins, Etheredge, A. Walsley, Farrington, Hardman, W. Slater, J. H. Slater, Millar, Harwood, Sykes, John Simpson, Marriott, Napier, E. Hewit, Wilde, Openshaw, Flower, Higham, Whittaker, Nuttall, Eltoft, Nadin, Samuels, the secretary, and fifteen friends. The minutes of the previous meeting having been read and confirmed, and the cause having been cried, Mr. Atkins, junior, counsel for the plaintiff, briefly opened the case with a statement of the facts, and called upon the plaintiff, Mr. Hill, to give his evidence. The latter was examined by Mr. Watts, senior counsel for the plaintiff, and cross-examined by Mr. J. H. Slater, senior counsel for the defendant. The second witness, Mr. James Thompson (Mr. A. Walsley) was examined by Mr. Atkins and cross-examined by Mr. J. H. Slater, and the third witness, Mr. Charles Drayton (Mr. Etheredge), having given his evidence, Mr. Watts summed up the plaintiff's case. The defendant's case was opened by Mr. J. H. Slater, after which the defendant, Mr. Farrington, was called, and gave evidence in support of his counsel's statements. The defendant's first witness, Mr. John Penkethman (Mr. Hardman) was examined by Mr. Walter Slater, and cross-examined by Mr. Atkins, and his second witness, Mr. John Scott (Mr. Napier), was examined by Mr. Walter Slater, and cross-examined by Mr. Watts, whereupon Mr. J. H. Slater summed up the defendant's case, and Mr. Watts replied thereto. The facts of the case were shortly these:—The plaintiff was a gamekeeper and the defendant a merchant, in whose service the plaintiff formerly was, and the action was founded on the following words uttered by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff in the presence of the gentlemen who are the plaintiff's witnesses:—"You are a thief, I have missed many things out of my house, and you have had them." The plaintiff's evidence was framed to show that he had sustained damage. The defendant pleaded that the words made use of were true in substance and in fact, and the whole of his evidence tended to prove justification. His counsel also contended that on the authority of Padmore v. Lawrence (11 Ad. & E. 380), the communication was privileged. The learned chairman instructed the jury not to consider the same as privileged, and explained to them the general effect and relevancy of the evidence which had been adduced, the relative weight and importance which should be attached to specified portions of it, what statements they were justified in viewing with suspicion, the general principles by which they should be guided in framing their verdict, and the criteria by which they should test the damages to be awarded. The jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with damages £101 5s. The honorary secretary proposed, and Mr. Hill seconded, a vote of thanks to the learned chairman for the ability with which he had discharged the judicial functions; and Mr. Jordan, in replying thereto, remarked that he considered the holding of moot trials the surest way of at once gaining legal knowledge and acquiring the art of public speaking, combining as it did amusement with instruction, and thus one of the most interesting meetings of the session came to a close.

SOUTHAMPTON LAW DEBATING SOCIETY

A MEETING of the society was held at 6, Portland-street on Thursday, the 1st instant, at 8 p.m., with Mr. F. H. Candy, solicitor, in the chair. Mr. Kelly moved "That a sub-committee be appointed and now named to revise or otherwise correct the rules of the society," and Messrs. F. H. Candy, C. F. Lucas, H. D. M. Page, and E. Kelly were nominated for the purpose. The motion was carried unanimously. The question for debate was as follows:

"A compounds with his creditors under sect. 126, Bankruptcy Act 1869, and pays, amongst his other creditors, B. 1s. in the £. Previous to the filing of the petition, B. agreed to continue to supply A. with goods on credit pending the proceedings, in consideration of A. promising to pay him his debt in full. A. continues to deal with B., and, by agreement, the balance of the old debt is placed on the top of the new account; various sums are paid, and the account is stated monthly, and a balance against A. carried on, such balances being at one time reduced considerably below the balance of the old debt, but ultimately B. sues A. for a large balance. A. claims to deduct from the amount sued for the amount of the balance of the old debt. Is he entitled to do so?"

Mr. E. Kelly argued in the affirmative and Mr. Page in the negative. Messrs. Lamport and C. F. Lucas also spoke in the affirmative. The chairman summed up, and the question was decided in the affirmative by a majority of five. A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the proceedings.

Queries.

LOSS OF ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP.—I shall be favoured if you will inform me, through the medium of your paper, the best course to take when articles of clerkship are destroyed by fire, or stolen, or, at any rate, cannot be found. Is any very great inconvenience entailed? What is the best system, for an articulated clerk to learn, of book-keeping?—NUMBER NINE.

(1) It depends upon how far the requirements of 6 & 7 Vict., cap. 73, ss. 8 and 9; and of 23 & 24 Vict., cap. 127, s. 7, have been complied with. (2) Chambers's small work on book-keeping is often used.—ED.]

READING FOR THE FINAL.—What books should an articulated clerk read for the final examination, and where can they be best obtained? Should the Judicature Acts be studied?—E. B. P.

[We recommend to your notice Self Preparation for the Final Examination, by John Indermaur, published by Stevens and Haynes. Of course you must study the Judicature Acts.—ED.]

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.—I was articulated on the 8th January, 1876, for five years. What is the earliest time that I can go up for the intermediate examination?—B.

[November, 1878.—ED.]

I go up for intermediate examination either in April or June of this year. Please inform me whether I shall be examined in the Judicature Acts, and if not, whether we shall be examined in the old procedure, as given in the appendix (Mr. Barber's) to "Hayne's Outlines of Equity."—LEX.

[Not on the subject of the Judicature Acts, but questions may be asked from the appendix named.—ED.]

Is a graduate in law honours obliged to pass the intermediate examination? If so, how soon can he enter for it? His term of service of articles is three years; must he wait till half that term expires, or can he enter for it after six months? which, allowing for the two years he saves by obtaining a degree, would make up half the term of five years, which he would otherwise have had to serve.—DUBITANS.

[Yes, within six months after the expiration of half his term of service.—ED.]

ASSIGNMENT OF ARTICLES.—A., an articulated clerk, covenants to serve B., his executor, administrators, and assigns, for the term of five years. A. is desirous of assigning himself to C. for the remainder of the term. Will you please say: (1) Can B. withhold his consent, and by so doing prevent A. from assigning himself? (2) If so, could not A. enter into fresh articles with C. for the full term of five years, and, after service of a sufficient period thereunder, to make up the full term of five years, apply for admission?—G.R.A.

notes were copied by the agent of the plaintiff's solicitors, and the copy submitted to me was authenticated by my signature. I have always given aid to any appeal, and I have never declined on any legal or technical grounds to assist an appeal. This suit in equity alleged an agreement that the plaintiff and defendant would jointly purchase 1160 boxes of oranges. They made no joint purchase. The purchase was made by the defendant alone. It was alleged that they agreed to contribute equally towards the purchase money for the same. The purchase-money paid, viz., £462, was the money of the defendant alone. It is further alleged that they agreed to resell the same boxes of oranges so purchased at the best obtainable prices, and to divide the profits, if any, or to contribute to the loss, if any, on the resale thereof. The plaintiff then alleges that, in performance of the said agreement, the defendant, on the behalf of himself and the plaintiff, purchased the said oranges. The sum paid by the defendant was paid in his own name only. The defendant in law obtained the right of property, and he received possession of the said oranges. It was a cash transaction on his part, and the plaintiff did not contribute to the cash payment. The plaintiff brought no contribution to the payment. Then, it was alleged that the plaintiff and the defendant, carrying on such partnership—for the partnership is thus assumed without the allegation of other fact to prove it than the agreement—trading within the jurisdiction of this court, sold the said boxes at the best obtainable prices, and the plaintiff desired to have the said "partnership" transaction wound-up, and was willing to bear his share of the debts and obligations of the partnership, and he asked that the "partnership" might be wound-up, and accounts of the partnership trading might be taken. There was a lot of oranges—viz., sixteen boxes delivered to the plaintiff, and another lot delivered, on the order of the plaintiff, to one Furland. It was not shown that these oranges were ever sold by them on a joint account, or that the plaintiff had contributed any work or labour, or made any joint sales, on account of the defendant. The storage for the oranges was paid by Collis. I held that there was no evidence to sustain the alleged partnership. The counsel for the plaintiff on this declaration of my decision gave a general notice of appeal, without stating any special ground. He had cited, in his opening, cases relating to the partnership, and contended that they applied to the facts of the present case. This notice of appeal, I inferred, arose on account of the inference I drew, adverse to the fact of an alleged partnership, and as being against the weight of evidence. The suit appeared to me to be in the nature of an attempt to obtain specific performance of an agreement for a partnership. The acts done by the plaintiffs as respected the disposal of the oranges received by them did not appear to me to have been sales on a joint account or part performance of the agreement. I alluded, in the course of discussion during the hearing, to acts necessary to be done to displace the legal right of property to the oranges in the defendant; and what was necessary to prove a joint title to the oranges in the plaintiffs. Having chiefly verbally given my judgment, I am unable to repeat correctly what was spoken by me in July last. The dispute related to an alleged partnership in the sale of a perishable commodity purchased by the defendant, and in respect of which the defendant desired no benefit whatever from the plaintiffs. The real question is, whether or not the inference I drew is correct or not? If I drew a wrong conclusion it appears to me that my conclusion should be corrected.

LEGAL NEWS.

IRISH LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.—A Dublin correspondent telegraphs under date Wednesday: "Mr. Gibson, Q.C., one of the members for the University of Dublin, has, subject to the Queen's approval, accepted the office of Attorney-General, vacant by the promotion of Mr. May to be Chief Justice. It is also understood that Mr. Plunket, Q.C., the senior member, has resigned the Solicitor-Generalship, and that Mr. Gerald Fitzgibbon, Q.C., Law Adviser to the Castle, will be recommended to Her Majesty to succeed him. The Queen's letter appointing Mr. May to be Lord Chief Justice of Ireland has arrived." It is believed that his re-election for Dublin University will not be opposed.

MR. T. J. ARNOLD, one of the London police magistrates, who has been seriously indisposed for some time, has now been granted two months' leave of absence by the Secretary of State. The learned gentleman, who is seventy-three years of age, was called to the Bar in 1823, and was appointed a magistrate at Worship-street in 1847.

THE Society of Arts memorial, praying the Lord Chancellor to cause the Patent Law Amendment Act of 1852 to be carried out in its integrity, has now been signed by 1150 persons interested in patent law reform, including nearly all the principal patent agents, representatives of Chambers of Commerce, Members of Parliament, manufacturers, engineers, artisans, members of mechanics' institutes, &c.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editors do not hold themselves responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

PARSONS V. TINLING.—The decision in Parsons v. Tinling, reported (35 L. T. Rep., N. S., p. 851), is so startling and so wide in its application, that your readers will be interested in the fuller report in the Liverpool Courier, which I have procured and now forward to you. I know not whether the case will be carried further on appeal, but before the Profession acquiesces in the decision of the Common Pleas, the following points appear to deserve attention. "Abide the event" is a technical term constantly used in rules of court and judges' orders, and it is submitted that when it is used in an Act of Parliament relating to a technical subject, it must be taken to have the technical meaning. In orders of reference, whether compulsory or voluntary, costs of cause are usually directed to "abide the event;" but it is well settled that this is subject to the County Courts Act (see the note in Day's Com. Law Proc. Act, p. 248, 4th edit.). In the case of Robertson v. Stern (13 C. B. 252), the late Mr. Justice Willes said: "The statute and order are not necessarily in conflict; the section adds to the ordinary events of a cause a third and modified one, namely, for the plaintiff, but without costs, unless he obtain an order." Again, sometimes an order is made to postpone a trial or grant a favour to defendant, on terms that he pay a certain sum into court "to abide the event." If a smaller sum is ultimately recovered by the plaintiff, it is never pretended that plaintiff is entitled to the whole of the money in court. If the present decision is right, the rule of distributive issues under the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, sect. 75, &c., would appear to be superseded, and judges must, in all cases where this rule has hitherto applied, be asked to make special orders as to costs. By the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 44, "where a new trial is granted on the ground that the verdict was against evidence, the costs of the first trial shall abide the event, unless the court shall otherwise order." These words appear as precise as Order LV., and yet the Court of Exchequer (upsetting the Master) held, that if the party loses the first trial and gains the second, he is neither to pay nor receive the costs of the first, unless the court orders otherwise. Had these points been put before the court, I venture to think their Lordships would not have felt bound to interpret what is at best a doubtful expression as a repeal by implication of distinct and most salutary enactments.

EXAMINATIONS FOR THE BAR.—May I ask the favour of your inserting in your paper a few remarks on the letter of an "Eye Witness," which appeared in your issue of Jan. 20, regarding the "cribbing" which he states he observed at the last examination of candidates for the Bar. I have been absent from town since the examination, or I would have noticed the matter sooner. No one for a moment, I should think, could defend the practice of "cribbing," because, putting aside anything else, the men who enter for these examinations distinctly, by implication, assent to be subject to the conditions under which they are held, and they (the candidates) know very well that one of those conditions is that notes, &c., are not to be referred to. It is, however, very much to be deplored, but unfortunately it is inevitable, that in all large bodies of men there should be certain individuals who have a lower estimation of what is right and honourable than the rest, and accordingly, among the large number of students for the Bar, it is not surprising if a certain portion are so mis-rupulous as to "crib." Under these circumstances, the Council of Legal Education takes such measures for the conduct of the examinations as shall sufficiently act as a check on any malpractices, without unfoundedly and improperly throwing discredit and disgrace on the general body of the students. Accordingly, the examination is held in the hall of Lincoln's Inn, which is very spacious. The examiners are seated in such a manner, and so far apart, that they cannot easily communicate unobserved, and two respectable and intelligent servants are employed to walk up and down the hall, their duty being to report any gentleman who is guilty of referring to books, &c., or seeking assistance in any other way. Well, sir, I was present at the examination, some of the incidents of which your correspondent so vividly describes, and the whole arrangement appeared to be very well carried out. I saw none of the malpractices which "Eye Witness" details, or anything at all similar to them, and if they had been as general and as openly perpetrated as he would lead the public to suppose, I do not think I could have failed to observe them. What does "Eye Witness" propose? What is the "sort of man" who alone is to be considered worthy of the enviable occupation of seeing that gentlemen do not "crib"? What signifies it that he is a superintendent of waiters or a putter on of gowns, so long as he is respectable and intelligent? The council and the officials entrusted with the management have done all they could without assuming that the students as a class are dishonest, and I don't think they will find any grounds for this assumption in your correspondent's letter. Finally, does it follow that because one sees certain of his comrades doing what is wrong, therefore he should trumpet the fact forth to the world and attempt to throw discredit on the whole of them? I deprecate cribbing quite as strongly as "Eye Witness" does, but what I consider is equally to be deprecated is the conduct of the student who, taking advantage of his position to watch his fellows, for no apparent reason publishes their misdeeds, throwing dirt on the body whose honour he loudly professes to be his first care.

A. C. MARSHALL (Student of Lincoln's Inn).

[On this principle many abuses would escape. We think "Eye Witness" was fully justified in the course which he took.—ED. L. T.]

THE TWO BRANCHES OF THE PROFESSION.—I believe it is now admitted that there is in England but one legal Profession, of which both barristers and solicitors are members, though of different branches of it. I also believe that there is a very general opinion that, while a complete fusion of these two branches of the legal Profession would be impracticable, yet that the restrictions which at present exist upon the passing of a person from one branch to the other ought at least to be considerably modified. The circumstance that the line of demarcation between the two branches is drawn from the very first day that a person who intends to join the legal Profession takes the necessary step for that purpose, in effect, deprives such person of any opportunity of judging for which branch he is better fitted, and hence it often happens that a person, after he has become a member of one branch of the Profession, finds, from experience and observation, that he is better fitted to practise in the other branch. At the present time a solicitor who is desirous of being called to the Bar is obliged to commence his legal career de novo, as if he had not before been connected with the legal Profession; though a barrister who desires to be enrolled as a solicitor has the privilege of completing his articles in three years, instead of in five. In both cases the same stamp duties are paid as are paid by persons previously unconnected with the Profession. Assuming the principle to be admitted that it is desirable that a person who has become a member of one branch of the Profession should be able to pass to the other branch with the interposition only of such delay as may be necessary to enable him to acquaint himself with the new duties and functions which he is about to undertake (and I think this is generally admitted at the present day), it appears to be unreasonable that such a person should be subject to the payment of a double stamp duty to the Exchequer. Under the Stamp Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97) a person must, before being called to the Bar, have paid the following duties: Upon his admission to be a member of an Inn of Court, £25; upon his admission to the degree of barrister-at-law, £50; making in all a stamp duty of £75 paid by such a person. Under the same Act a person must, before being admitted as a solicitor, have paid the following duties: Upon his articles of clerkship, £80; upon his admission as a solicitor, £25; making in all a stamp duty of £105 paid by such a person. Now I think it must be admitted that either of these duties is a sufficiently heavy tax, even upon the first entrance of a person into the legal Profession; and yet when a person who has become a member of one branch of the Profession, and has paid in stamp duties a sum of at least £75, and perhaps of £105, is desirous to pass from that branch into the other, he is obliged to pay the same stamp duties as if he were then for the first time entering the Profession, so that, before he can practise in the branch finally chosen by him, he is obliged to pay the very unreasonable sum of £180 for stamp duties. It has already been shown that it is impossible for a person entering the legal Profession to obtain the necessary materials to enable him to decide for which branch of it he is best fitted, until he has already committed himself to one branch. Having found out his error, it is sufficiently unfortunate for him that there should be further delay and consequent expense before he can be admitted to the other branch, though that there should be some delay seems to result from the different nature of the functions of the different branches of the Profession; but that such a person should be liable to the payment of a double stamp duty seems to be unreasonable. This double stamp duty is, in fact, only justifiable, if at all, on the ground that barristers and solicitors, instead of forming together one profession, form, in reality, two distinct professions. I do not think that this ground can at the present day be maintained, and if not it is evidently unfair to impose a double stamp duty on the entrance to one and the same profession. Even, however, if it could be contended that barristers and solicitors form two distinct professions, that would not justify the imposition of a double stamp duty if it appear to be desirable to facilitate the passing of persons from the one profession to the other. This reasoning has already on two separate occasions met with the approval of Parliament—viz., in the cases of Irish and of Scotch barristers, whose professions are clearly distinct professions from the legal profession in England. In the case of Irish barristers it was provided by the Stamp Act of 1870 that a person who has been admitted a member of the Society of King's Inn in Dublin shall be exempt from the payment of any duty upon his admission as a member of an Inn of Court in England, and that a person who has been called to the Bar in Ireland may be called to the Bar in England upon payment of a stamp duty of £10. The result of this enactment is, that a person who has been called to the Bar in Ireland and is subsequently called to the Bar in England, pays no more stamp duty to the Exchequer than if he had been called to the English Bar in the first instance—viz., £75; for of the £75 paid by him before being called to the Bar in Ireland, the sum of £10 is repaid by the Government to the treasurer of the Society of the King's Inns, Dublin, and is applied by the latter for the benefit of that society. (See 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 31). And, therefore, it is but just that upon the English call he should pay a further stamp duty of £10 to the exchequer, for otherwise he would have paid £65 only for stamp duty. An Irish barrister being thus entitled to be called to the English Bar without the payment of a double stamp duty, it was considered unjust that a person who had been admitted an advocate in the Scotch courts, and had upon such admission paid a stamp duty of £50, should be subject (as under the Stamp Act of 1870 he was subject) to pay a further duty of £50 upon his admission to the degree of barrister-at-law in England. The Stamp Act of 1870 was accordingly amended in this respect by an Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 19), which provides (sect. 1) that no stamp duty shall be payable upon the admission in England to the degree of barrister-at-law of a person previously duly admitted as an advocate in Scotland. It will be observed that this Act does not exempt a Scotch advocate from the payment of the duty of £25 upon his being admitted a member of one of the Inns of Court in England, although, by the Stamp Act of 1870, an Irish barrister is exempt from the payment of that duty. The reason is that the Irish barrister paid that duty before his Irish call, viz., upon being admitted a member of the society of the King's Inn in Dublin, whereas no such duty is payable in Scotland by a person admitted as an advocate. The result of these enactments is that a person not connected with the legal profession of any country, may be called to the English Bar upon payment of a stamp duty of £75, and that a person who has been admitted as a barrister in Ireland, or as an advocate in Scotland (although clearly not a member of the English legal profession), may be admitted a barrister in England upon making up the stamp duty paid by him to the Exchequer before his Irish or Scotch admission to the sum of £75. And yet a person who is already a member of the legal profession in England, and who has paid to the Exchequer the prescribed duties upon his admission, is obliged, if he wishes to pass to the other branch of his profession, to pay a further stamp duty of the same amount as if he had never been a member of the legal profession, and had never paid any stamp duty to the Exchequer upon his admission as such. The object of the accompanying draft clause is to remedy this state of the law. By this clause, a barrister who is desirous of being admitted as a solicitor is made liable to pay only £30 further stamp duty, being the difference between the £75, which he must have paid before he could be admitted as a barrister, and the £105 which every person must pay before he can be admitted as a solicitor; and a solicitor who is desirous of being called to the Bar is exempted from the payment of any further stamp duty, the sum of £105, which must have been paid by him before he was admitted a solicitor, exceeding the £75 payable before a person can be called to the Bar. In the wording of this clause the phraseology of the statute as to Scotch advocates (37 & 38 Vict. c. 19, s. 1), has as nearly as possible, been adopted. As the proposed amendment affects the Revenue, it will, of course, have to be considered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; it should not, however, meet with any opposition from him, considering, first, that it will remedy a substantial injustice which at present exists; secondly, the precedents of the cases of Irish and Scotch barristers; thirdly, that there are now comparatively few persons who, having expended their time and money in obtaining admission to one branch of the Profession, have the courage to abandon that branch, and get admitted into the other, the loss to the Revenue will be very small. Nor can it be objected that there will in practice be any difficulty in working the clause, for, as I have already shown, a similar exemption to that now proposed obtains in the case of Irish barristers and Scotch advocates who are called to the English Bar." LEX.

LEGAL HONOURS.—Perhaps you or some of your readers will be kind enough to explain why it is that the "honours" obtained by solicitors at the final examination are never recorded in the Law List. I observe that every conceivable distinction obtained by members of the Bar in their examinations is carefully noted up in the List of "Counsel," why, then, should a "Clifford's-inn prizeman," the "senior wrangler" of our Profession, be denied any mention of his well-earned position? This has always seemed to me a glaring anomaly, and, being anxious a short time since to ascertain whether it arose from mere oversight, I addressed a letter to the editor of the Law List upon the subject, and was honoured by the curt reply "that such announcements are inadmissible." The matter seems to me well worthy the attention of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, and I should be very pleased to see the error rectified in the next issue of the Law List. A NON-PRIZEMAN.

BUFFOONERY ON THE BENCH.—I had occasion yesterday to be a spectator at the Shoreditch County Court, Old-street, City-road, and was surprised at the remarks made by the learned judge. To give an instance: a witness was asked his (witness's) occupation. He replied, a coostermonger. The judge answered, "Oh, that is very general; everybody is a coostermonger except solicitors and barristers." There were several solicitors and a barrister present, and doubtless they were obliged to the judge for his learned distinction. Shortly after this a case was called on where the plaintiff was suing for damages for breach of contract, on the non-delivery of three cows. There were several witnesses, and the defendant's solicitors made the usual request, where the evidence is likely to be conflicting, namely, to have the witnesses out of court. The judge said, "Oh, rubbish. Go on." The same solicitor asked the plaintiff, in cross-examination, how he arrived at the amount of damage claimed, as he had simply put a lump sum upon the particulars. The judge said it was unnecessary, as he presumed his damage to be £5 for each cow. The plaintiff was requested to make out specifically his damage; the judge replied that the court was not a place to learn reading and writing. I have always understood that the ordering of witnesses out of court was an old-established rule, and has a most salutary effect in arriving at the truth. Again, when a plaintiff brings an action for damages in the Superior Court, the onus is always upon him to prove the expense and loss he has been put to. Perchance the Shoreditch County Court, being an inferior court of record, the rules followed by its superior brother do not apply. As a matter of amusement to idlers at the court, the running comments and satire of the judge may have an exhilarating effect; but it is anything but encouraging to the parties interested, particularly when the jokes and personal rebuffs are on the wrong side. ACCOUNTANTS PRACTISING AS SOLICITORS IN BANKRUPTCY BUSINESS.—You will no doubt remember our writing you respecting a bankruptcy petition having been filed by an accountant (a copy of the notice convening first meeting being enclosed); of course, as you said in your article on it, there was nothing on the face of the notice to render the accountant liable under the Stamp Act 1870. However, since then the first meeting has been held, and in the list of creditors this accountant appears as a creditor for about £20, and when he was asked how the debt was incurred, he said it was for money lent, and when further pressed he was compelled to own that this money had never been really advanced, but that he was to receive that amount from the bankrupt for his trouble. We are of opinion that sufficient evidence could be obtained to get a conviction under sect. 60 of the Stamp Act, 1870. Perhaps it would be as well to state that we informed the Incorporated

Law Society of what we sent you previously, and also the Legal Practitioners' Society, but they have taken no notice of our communication.—A FIRM OF COUNTRY SOLICITORS.

90. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT.—A. executed a mortgage in fee to T., and paid it off in T.'s lifetime, and took a receipt but no re-conveyance. T.'s only children are his two daughters, who are his executrixes and residuary legatees. One of his daughters has since married. It is considered that under sect. 4 the executrixes can as such convey the legal estate, and that the husband of the married daughter must join. Is it necessary that the deed should be acknowledged under the Fines and Recoveries Act, this ceremony not being in terms dispensed with by this section? It is also considered that after payment of the mortgage debt T. became "a bare trustee," and that upon his death the legal estate was vested, under sect. 5, in the executrixes, and that by sect. 6 the married one can convey, without acknowledgment as a joint seid, without the husband's concurrence. Is this view correct? J. R.

91. WILL.—A testator by his will, dated in 1864, appointed A. his executor, and devised all trust and mortgaged estates vested in him to B. Can A., as such executor, on payment off of a mortgage made to the testator, convey the legal estate in the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee by virtue of the Vendor and Purchaser Act 1874, notwithstanding the devise of mortgaged estates contained in the will? H. S.

92. CONVEYANCING.—Money is raised by public subscription for founding a home for a certain class of destitutes, and therewith is purchased a house and premises for carrying on the work. The conveyance is taken in the names of trustees in the usual way. Should the deed be enrolled? NICH.

93. THE RIGHT OF SOLICITORS TO SEE PRISONERS.—I should feel obliged if you would kindly favour me with your opinion as to whether or not a superintendent of police is justified in not allowing the solicitor of a prisoner an interview with the latter when in custody. In the district where I practice it is the custom of the police to refuse the prisoner's solicitor to see prisoners until they have had him in custody some time, and have frequently, in the interval, obtained some admission from the latter. [The practice complained of—and not confined to your case—is a very reprehensible one. ### Answers.

(Q. 79.) PARTY WALLS.—How is it possible to answer a question so badly put? Is the party wall within the district affected by the Metropolitan Buildings Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), or any similar statute? What is the nature of the property of the "one owner" in the party wall? Is it as tenant in common with the other co-owner or does each own a distinct portion of the wall and the land upon which it is built? L.

(Q. 1.) STAMP.—The Commissioners have lately adjudged that a deed of appointment of new trustees, which contains a conveyance of the trust premises from the old to the new trustees, requires two stamps of 1s., which is contrary to the view expressed by your correspondent "Ned" on this subject in LAW TIMES for Nov. 18, 1876. C. J. RAWLINS, Romford.

(Q. 81.) ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—The doctrine of Tyler v. Meads does not apply in this case, as the mortgaged estate is not vested in the married woman for her separate use. The mortgage cannot be transferred without acknowledgment. VADITE.

(Q. 83.) DOWER.—The real estate of a person dying intestate is expressly charged as assets to be administered in courts of equity, for payment of the debts of the intestate. See 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 104, sect. 1. The widow has no right to dower prior to the creditor's claims against the real estate, which is clearly explained by 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 106, sect. 5. See Williams R. F., 11th edit, page 234. C. H. S.

(Q. 86.) LAW OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.—It is clear that the husband would be entitled to the whole of the rents and profits which might arise from the lands so devised to his wife, and acquire a freehold estate therein during coverture. On the decease of the wife, the lands would descend to her heir-at-law, subject to the husband's courtesy. The husband would not be entitled to as estate by the curtesy, unless he had issue by his wife that might by possibility inherit the estate as her heir. The wife cannot devise the lands so as to deprive her husband of his estate by the curtesy. If the wife should die without issue, her husband her surviving, the lands would descend to her heir. If the wife survive her husband, her estates in fee simple will remain to herself and her heirs after his death, unaffected by any debts which he may have incurred, or by any alienation which he may have attempted to make. See Williams B. P., 11th edit., 221 and following pages. C. H. S.

—On the decease of the married woman the property will, subject to the husband's curtesy, descend to her heir-at-law or customary heir. She cannot make a will devising it (during the continuance of the coverture), and so deprive her husband of his curtesy. If she die without having had any issue, her husband has no right in the land. If she die, having had issue which was capable of inheriting her estate, but did not survive her, he will be tenant by the curtesy; if she survive him, any attempted disposition by his will would be void. VADUUM.

—Your correspondent "Soot" will find the law which he requires collected in Bacon's Abridgment, title, "Curtesy of England." To take the simple case of land left in fee simple to a woman who was married without settlements, who has children, and who has entered into possession; then, at her decease, the land becomes her husband's for his life. She cannot by will deprive him of his life estate, and he will be equally entitled to it if none of the children survive the mother; but, if there never has been any issue born alive of the marriage, the husband at her death will have no right to his curtesy. If he dies before his wife he has no interest in the land to dispose of by will, which will then remain to the widow and her heirs. L. A. D.

CODIFICATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.

UNDER the auspices of the Trades Union Congress Parliamentary Committee a meeting was held on Tuesday evening last at the Society of Arts, John-street, Adelphi, when Sir J. Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., K.C.S.T., delivered a lecture on "A Penal Code." The chair was taken by the Right Honourable Lord Coleridge, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas; and amongst those present were Baron Bramwell, Lord Fortescue, Mr. Holmes, M.P., Mr. Mundella, M.P., Professor Hunter, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Q.C., Admiral Maxse, Mr. F. Meadows White, Mr. E. S. Wright, Mr. C. M. Roupell, &c. The hall was densely crowded, the majority of those present being working men, who appeared to take great interest in the subject.

Lord Coleridge, in opening the proceedings, said they were met together that evening for the purpose of listening to Sir Fitzjames Stephen, an authority on the subject of codification well worth listening to, so that for the present he (the chairman) would refrain from addressing them.

Sir J. Fitzjames Stephen, Q.C., upon rising to deliver his lecture was loudly cheered. He said that before he entered upon the subject of a penal code, he would say a word as to how the present lecture originated. At the meeting of the Trades Union Congress, held last summer at Newcastle, his friend, Mr. Crompton, read a paper on the codification of the criminal law, in the course of which he was good enough to make a flattering reference to himself (the speaker.) Subsequently a correspondence ensued, and in the result he was asked to address them that evening. He felt it was an honour to a person who had devoted his leisure for a long period of time to studies usually supposed to be exceedingly dry, not to say repulsive. If he had tried to attract public attention, it was a great satisfaction to feel that a large and important section of the community which the meeting represented took an interest in his work and wished to know how it had proceeded. He must say that it had been to him a subject of great surprise that while the slightest alteration in the machinery by which laws were made should excite such intense and passionate interest, the laws themselves, when they were made, and even those which influenced all of them, and which they were bound to observe under a penalty of life, liberty, or reputation, should be treated, not as a subject of liberal study and education, but as a sort of mystery known only to a few students, and incapable of being known to the world at large. For his own part, he had long been of opinion that if the law were put into a form so intelligible that persons by taking a reasonable degree of trouble might acquaint themselves with it, it would form a branch of study as interesting and as curious and as generally popular as almost any other. (Hear.) He thought, for instance, we might fairly say that the criminal law, the law of contracts, of wrongs, and many other subjects of the same kind, were quite as interesting as the subject of political economy, which had attracted, justly or rightly, so much attention. He could not but hope, that if the law were thrown into such a shape they would not only have done something of the greatest possible convenience, but would have added a new branch to literature, a new topic of public discussion. (Cheers.) Without further dwelling upon these generalities, and assuming that it was generally agreed that the object aimed at was a desirable one, he would come to the subject itself. And, first of all, he must observe, that in regard to all questions connected with codification, two great questions arose—first, how they were to draw the code; and, secondly, how they were to pass it into law? In regard to the second of these questions, no one was better aware than himself of the extraordinary difficulty which it possessed. Drawing up a reduction of law to a set of systematic propositions was just as much a literary work and a work of art as the writing of a book, and, as such, if it were to be done well, the great branches of it must be the work of one mind (hear, hear), although it might and ought to be carefully kept in check by other minds. They would never get Parliament to put so great confidence in any one person as to entrust him with a work of that kind; on the other hand, it was a work which Parliament could not do for itself. The difficulties of legislation were exceedingly great, and he spoke from an experience which he did not further wish to remark upon. Parliament had done many great and noble works, and it was for that body, in its wisdom, to determine upon the proper manner of throwing the law into what he conceived to be its proper form. Not having the honour of a voice in the deliberations of that body, he could only hope that they would find the proper means of doing it. (Cheers.) With regard to the manner in which codes should be drawn, and what they should contain, and that more particularly as to the character and contents of a penal code, although the words "criminal law" were very short, and the phrase was simple and familiar, they would find that when they came to look at the matter more in detail, it was a very difficult thing to separate it clearly from the other parts of law, and consider it as a branch standing by itself, for the nature of all law was such that its different branches ran into each other. Before they could understand the law of theft they must know a good deal about the law of property; before they could understand the crime of bigamy, they must know what constituted a valid marriage; therefore, when they had separated the criminal law from the rest of the legal system of the country, that was their first task in codification, and was one which presented, not by any means insuperable, but considerable difficulties which ought to be dealt with and allowed for. (Hear, hear.) In the first place, one would say generally that a crime was an act which was punished by the law which was, in point of fact, punished by the law, whether it ought to be or not. One branch of the law defined crime and allotted punishments, and another pointed out the mode and proceeding. There was the law relating to crimes and punishments, and that relating to criminal procedure. If they codified they would have two codes, the first a penal code, that was a code defining crimes and fixing a punishment to them; and then they would have a code of criminal procedure, defining the manner in which the person suspected of crime was to be arrested, tried, and punished. Upon the present occasion, he would confine himself to the first branch of the subject, viz., a penal code; and here, again, it was necessary to limit the subject within certain bounds. In one point of view, they might describe almost every law as being criminal law, because every law was in the nature of a command, addressed to a person or to persons, and it involved a penalty in case that command was broken. They would find a large number of Acts which no one would call parts of criminal law, which nevertheless did afford a great variety of Acts. Having set aside what they might call occasional offences and penalties, they then came to what did form the bulk of the criminal law, that was to say, acts which were regarded on general grounds morally were regarded as acts which were to be prevented by the fear of punishment; and that is what he meant by the criminal law. Almost every act highly injurious to the public at large or to the public morals, and also every act by which the person, reputation, or some of the rights of individuals, or property of individuals injured of a bad motive, were in general crimes. They must not suppose that those who spoke of codifying the law wished radically to change it. (Hear.) They must begin by re-arranging, by seeing what was absolute, what was technical, or belonged to the past ancient generation. They must go through the whole of it, and adapt it bit by bit to the present state of knowledge and feeling; and that was the object proposed by those who wished to codify the law; and the object, he must say, was one which ought to appeal to men of all political opinions. (Applause.) It must appeal to the Conservative, because nothing was better for the law than putting it before the public in a plain and intelligible form; it must appeal to the Liberal, because nothing could more tend to set forth the abuses in the clearest possible light. (Hear, hear.) In order to construct such a penal code as would reflect the feelings, the loyalty, the good sense, and the orderly temper of the present day, it was necessary first to ascertain clearly what the law of the land was, and then to consider what it ought to be, and, lastly, to ascertain how they were to take from that which is, to put it to that which ought to be. The first point they had to consider was, What was the law? Having devoted very much time in various forms, both to the study and the practice of this branch of it, he might tell them that they might consider it, first, in regard to its substance, and next with reference to its form or manner of expression. As to its substance, he felt no hesitation in saying that at the present day the greater part of it—those parts which were commonly in use, and which they saw in working every day at the Old Bailey, or at the courts of Quarter Sessions—upon the whole was eminently rational and humane, and the more they came to understand it, the more they would comprehend the true nature of its principles and procedure, and the more they would see that it was a system on the whole to be tried. (Hear, hear.) He was bound to confess that the character of humanity and reasonableness, which he claimed for it, was not of old date. Within living memory it was disgraced in certain respects by cruelty, and also in certain technicalities, and which, in some instances, that cruelty was evaded and utilized. The condition it had been brought to at the present day was one of the results of that general wish to improve all our institutions, which had acted so powerfully upon every part of the history of this country for the last half century. At least the subject was obscure and technical, and if they were to contrast the criminal law of England as it was even fifty years ago with the laws that were now they would be as much surprised at the changes as if they were to contrast Parliament for a similar period of time. With regard to the form of the law, he did not wish to speak rashly, certainly not disrespectfully, of a system of which he had had much to do; but he thought the form of English criminal law was about as confused, as intricate, and as objectionable in every possible way as it could be made. If the object had been to conceal its substantial merits, and enable people to make it thoroughly unpopular on good grounds, he should say excellent means had been taken for that purpose. The law was composed of three distinct elements. First of all, a large proportion of it existed in the form of unwritten rules and principles, which were often commonly said to be handed down by tradition by one generation of lawyers and judges to another. The books in which these principles were writtendown were not in themselves authoritative, they were merely the record of the opinion of the writers as to law as they then knew and understood it. The result of that formed one element of the law; another element consisted of Acts of Parliament; and the third consisted of reports of cases which had been decided in some instances. The result was that the law formed an enormous mass of Acts of Parliament, text books, and reports of decided cases; and when they came to study them they would perceive that the total mass put together represented an extraordinary amount of experience and solid good sense, and great shrewdness and observation upon the part of a long succession of judges to adopt this unwritten law to the wants of successive generations. The whole mass did contain an immense amount of what was valuable; but, on the other hand, it contained it in a shape enough to drive the most patient student to distraction. (Hear, hear.) A work had lately been published, which, he supposed, was regarded as a great authority on all questions of criminal law, called Russell on Crimes. It had been edited by various learned persons, for Sir William Russell published his book more than fifty years ago, and in its re-publication there was a learned collection of all the authorities he had been referring to. It contained altogether 2886 octavo pages; it filled three enormous volumes, and it cost 5½ guineas. That mere statement of the matter gave rather an inadequate notion of the degree of labour of making out its contents, and reducing the matter to a practical shape. If they were to have a good penal code they must, first of all, "boil it down" into a small compass, and get out of it the net result of what it contained. (Hear, hear.) As to the question of codifying statutes, in the first place the statute law consisted of a great number of Acts of Parliament, defining with very great precision and elaboration different offences which it was intended to punish, and they must say, How could you shorten or abbreviate that in any way unless without altering it? But there were ways of expressing the same meaning in words of greater or less clearness and length. In the 11th section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, the words contained thirty-two lines, and it was all on sentence. (Laughter.) In older Acts of Parliament they would find that sections were not introduced; now they were better drawn but even at the present day there were defects in their construction. Acts of Parliament must be much more shortly expressed, and by a judicious packing, so to speak, put into a very small compass indeed. When they had worked out the net result of all the Acts, then they were in a condition to say what was the existing law of the country, see where it was antiquated, technical, and improper, and then alter it; but until that was before them, they might talk for ever about reforming the law. He was very anxious to avoid the appearance of puffing works of his own composition, but since they had done him the honour of asking him to deliver the present lecture, he could not very well avoid what he was about to say regarding a certain work to which he had devoted his leisure for several years. Once, through the great kindness of Lord Coleridge, when he was Attorney-General, under his instructions, a Bill for the codification of another branch of the law was drawn and submitted to Parliament, but it never got further than being "mentioned" in Parliament, and that on the very last day of the session of 1873. (A laugh.) He (the speaker) also attempted, on another occasion, with the assistance of another highly valued friend, the Recorder of London, Mr. Russell Gurney, to prepare a Bill for the codification of the law relating to homicide. That Bill did get as far as a "select committee," who made a report in favour of the measure, but did not quite see their way to further action in the matter. This experience had led him to the conclusion that it was very undesirable to attempt to codify a little bit of the law, because one could hardly do so without touching on subjects which would affect the rest of it. If they codified at all, they ought to do something on a considerable scale. (Cheers.) He thought it possible, without asking the assistance of Parliament, to take a large branch of the law and reduce it to the shape to which he had referred. He contended that every part of the law might be reduced with proper pains and labour, and accordingly he had employed his leisure of some time past in performing the operation upon the criminal law. He had now practically completed, and had just got ready for the publication of this book (cheers.); and he hoped in the course of a very few weeks to publish it. He had undertaken this work more or less too, as a public matter, and in the hope that it might be of some public service. Having to the best of his ability travelled through with the different authorities, and sifted the wheat from the chaff, and arranged it in a consecutive manner, the net result of it was that the law as it now stood, "with all its imperfections upon its head," and with all the drawbacks to its merits, could be expressed, and he had so expressed it in the shape of a book of about 300 moderate octavo size pages. (Cheers.) The difficulties of the subject were so great that it was hazardous to say it was completed, but he would be prepared at the proper time and place, and before any body of persons competent to prove his words, to say that the book contained practically the whole of the criminal law as it at present stood, and might safely be taken as a starting point, upon which legislation might ultimately be based. Of all departments of law the easiest to arrange in an intelligible and systematic manner, was the criminal law. It would fall into various divisions. First, a variety of general principles as to what constitutes criminality and what constitutes an excess of acts which would otherwise be criminal; then they would have to define what constituted participation in crime; then there was the definition of punishment to be inflicted; then they would go to the different crimes that might be committed; then came offences against public authority, and acts injurious to the public at large. They might pass to the causes which affected individuals as regarded their persons and their property. Though there were some cases in which breach of contract was concerned, such as the law of conspiracy, and of master and servant, and on such matters they ought to have the most distinct and definite statements. The law on all these subjects might be greatly compressed. Though when they had gone through that process of sifting, they would have some kind of notion how interesting, and, at the same time, how difficult and laborious the study of the law was. He would be the last person in the world to depreciate in any way the extraordinary amount of labour, ingenuity, and ability displayed on certain subjects in the English law books. He thought it would be a public misfortune to re-enact the criminal law of England just as it stood in its present condition, for it required much change, not only in its form but also in its substance, for it contained some things that were obsolete, some things excessively technical and intricate, and also there would be found a great deal of matter very clumsily arranged. In order to make such a penal code as the nation ought to expect, it would be necessary that the person who prepared it should have full liberty to suggest wide or extensive amendments in the law itself.

(Hear, hear.) He suggested that they should go through some statement of the criminal law, remedy one by one its various defects, remove those parts of the law which are obsolete; and by making those changes they would have improved the law to a considerable extent. By making such improvements they would, as it were, be taking away the stakes around which the weeds cling, so that the stream might run the clearer. They would then be able to re-enact the criminal law in a much shorter form than that in which it now stood, and they might then re-cast the whole, so as to make it worthy of the country and of the time. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. J. D. Prior, Secretary of the Amalgamated Carpenters' and Joiners' Society, then proposed the following resolution: "That this meeting is of opinion that the time has now arrived when it is incumbent upon the government to codify the criminal laws of this country, and earnestly prays her Majesty's Government not to let this Session of Parliament pass away without steps having been taken to secure this object." In doing so he said that ever since working men had been allowed to combine they had felt the need for the codification of the criminal laws. Codification, however, could only be brought about when the nation made up its mind to do it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Burnett, Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, briefly seconded the motion. Earl Fortescue, in supporting it, said that he had long been of opinion that the law required amendment much more in its form than in its substance, because, for many years, they might truly say the successive Governments and successive Parliaments had shown themselves anxious to remove injustices in the law when they were brought fairly under their notice.

Sir George Bramwell was afraid that this was a subject which he had not sufficiently considered; at the same time it was impossible for nearly half a century to be engaged in learning, practising, and administering, and he would venture also to say, reforming the law, to arrive at any other opinion than that in favour of codification. In the first place, it was impossible for any man with a methodical mind not to be dissatisfied with the law as it now stood. It was traditionally of the very worst kind, for it was not as though a code once existed. The bankruptcy law was a code, and if by misfortune it was lost, it was to be hoped that some one would remember sect. 1 or 2. (Laughter.) But the law was not traditional in that way; it was supposed to rest in the "breast of the judges." It was no use if they tried to look for it. Consequently it came to them in the most confused manner, and it being difficult to say what the law was, no wonder that the orderly, logical mind would be in favour of codification. But there were other things which disposed him to look favourably on codification, for it would certainly be an enormous facility for those who practised and administered the law if they had a code. (Hear, hear.) It was true that they would have things in an abstract form, and there might be a difficulty in applying them. He doubted whether the whole of the law could be included in a small octavo volume, or that a code would be attended with all the good effects on the people at large as Sir J. Fitzjames Stephen seemed to think it would. He had no doubt, however, but that a code would be a good thing, and that it would simplify the law, and make it more easy, while it certainly must improve the law. (Cheers.) All he could say was that if he was not so hasty upon it as some people, at all events he had no misgiving that it was the right thing to do. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. R. S. Wright and Mr. Harrison having also spoken in favour of the resolution, Lord Coleridge said that he had for some years endeavoured to simplify the law. Two subjects particularly had engaged his attention—the law of evidence, and that relating to juries, now in a most chaotic state—but his experience in dealing with them in Parliament was not encouraging. There was a distinction between a digest and a code, and the distinction was plain and important to remember. A person who made a digest could only deal with the subject, correcting and amending it, as a private individual—and then it would not be useful to the public generally, but to those who had to practise and administer the law. A person who desired a code, desired something different, because a code was a statement of the law, not as it stood, but as it should be, and to make all clear and reasonable. In procuring a code, great difficulties would be found in the way. In the first place a code could never be passed clause by clause through Parliament. No minister would undertake to pass a code through both Houses in the face of the opposition that would be raised. The only way in which it would be possible would be by assimilating the process in England to that which had been followed elsewhere. A code of laws worthy of the country was greatly wanted, but it could only be by meetings like the present bringing to bear their influence upon members of Parliament, otherwise the Legislature would never give its authority into the hands of a commission of distinguished men who alone could form a true sense of what was required. (Cheers.)

The resolution was then put to the meeting, and unanimously carried. Mr. H. Broadhurst, Secretary to the Trades' Union Congress Parliamentary Committee proposed, and Mr. W. Rothay seconded, a vote of thanks to Sir J. Fitzjames Stephen for his instructive and valuable lecture, and it was carried by acclamation.

A similar compliment was paid to Lord Coleridge for presiding.

Mr. Mundella, M.P., in supporting the resolution, said that a code of laws could be obtained by the force of public opinion only.

The proceedings then terminated.

BIRMINGHAM LAW SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of the Birmingham Society was held on the 14th inst., at the Library, Wellington Passage, Bennett's Hill. Mr. A. E. E. (president) occupied the chair, and there were also present Messrs. T. Martineau, C. E. Mathews, J. Balden, jun., Joseph Rowlands, J. B. Karlake, S. J. Mitchell, C. Davies, G. J. Johnson, T. J. Lee, B. Weeks, L. W. Lewis (Walsall), W. Morris, Jacob Rowlands, Marigold, Spencer, Powell, C. F. Saunders, L. P. Rowley, W. S. Allen, and T. Horton (hon. sec.).

The report of the committee, which was taken as read, stated that the society at present numbered 190 members, as against 176 for the year 1875. The society had lost two members by death. The committee reported the completion and occupation by the society of the new buildings in August last. The fittings, with the cost of variations and additions to the original design, had brought up the total expenditure to the sum of £2500. The excess of £500 upon the original estimate had been met by a further issue of debentures. The debentures had been issued, and the deed securing the same had been completed, and the library buildings vested in Messrs. J. R. Karlake, W. Johnson, and E. H. Lee, as trustees for securing the same the debenture debt interest. The new text books and legal publications of the year with the current series of the reports have been placed in the library. The committee have also expended on legal and jurisprudential works the balance of the donations to the Library Extension Fund carried over from 1875, with the further donations received subsequent to the issuing of their report for that year. The committee venture to hope that the additions which the library extension fund had enabled them to make had rendered some departments now almost complete and in others had formed an efficient working library. A new edition of the catalogue was much needed, but the charges upon the society's income for the present would preclude the undertaking of the same as a part of the ordinary expenditure. The anticipations of the committee as to the beneficial effect of the reduction of the subscription of articled clerks had been fully realised, forty articled clerks having applied for and been admitted to the privileges of the use of the library. In order to further the objects of the Law Students' Society, the committee had arranged for their meetings for discussion and debate being held the library room, under regulations proposed by the committee, and which were at once accepted by the Students' Society. To the same end the committee had also allowed the students' society's library to be placed in the basement room of the library building, under the charge of the librarian. The committee had had under consideration the various measures introduced during the year to the Legislature involving legal or jurisprudential questions, and, where necessary, action had been taken with reference thereto. The subject of the assize district had, the committee were glad to notice, been again under consideration of the town council, and a memorial with reference thereto from that body had been laid before the Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary. This memorial urged the formation of an assize district for civil and criminal business, taken from the counties of Warwick, Worcester, and Stafford, with Birmingham as the assize town. The committee believed that the granting of the proposed assize and assize district could not long be deferred now it was demanded, not only by the legal profession, but by the other members of the community interested in the efficient administration of justice in so important a portion of the midland counties. The committee had also had under consideration a suggestion from the late mayor for the change of the site of the proposed law courts from New Edmund-street to the vicinity of the Old Square, and after examination of the plans of the courts proposed to be erected in New Edmund-street, the committee determined to present a memorial to the town council deprecating the proposed change of site, and asking that, before building plans were definitely approved, the same should be sub-

THE NOTTINGHAM INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

THE first annual meeting of the above society was held during the week, at the Grand Jury Room of the Town Hall, when there were only about a dozen members present. Mr. Enfield, president of the society, occupied the chair.

The President, in opening the meeting, said that in consequence of a communication from Messrs. Freeth, Rawson, and Cartwright, they had to add the name of that firm to the law library, amongst other gentlemen who had, without any compensation, presented their interest to the society. (Hear, hear.)

The report was taken as read, and is as follows:—

The council congratulate the members upon the present satisfactory position of the society. Eight new members have been elected during the year, namely—Messrs. J. Black, A. Bright, J. T. Brown, A. Cann, S. E. Heath, W. H. Stevenson, J. T. Ward, and H. Wyles. The present number of members is sixty-four. There have been eleven council meetings during the year. The council have appointed the following committees during the year:—Finance Committee, Law Library Committee, Conveyancing Charges Committee, Conditions of Sale Committee, Parliamentary Bills Committee, Bankruptcy Law Amendment Committee. Twenty-four committee meetings have been held.

LAW LIBRARY.—In the last annual report the council stated, that the only obstacle to the immediate transfer of the existing law library to this society was, that certain of the subscribers to the library claimed to be entitled to proprietary interest in the books and other property of the library as distinguished from the other subscribers, who, it was stated, were only entitled to the use of the books, but the council trusted that some satisfactory solution of that difficulty would speedily be found. Accordingly, at its first meeting the council authorised Mr. S. G. Johnson to treat with the proprietary subscribers of the library, with a view to the purchase or transfer of their interests to this society. Mr. Johnson subsequently reported that several gentlemen had offered so to transfer their interests without compensation. Of the six remaining proprietary subscribers of the library, five required pecuniary compensation for such a transfer, and the sixth was not communicated with on the subject by reason of his having resided away from Nottingham for some years. It having been discovered from an examination of the library that its value was considerably impaired by reason of volumes of different reports being missing, the council at its meeting on the 6th Sept. last, decided not to pay the amounts that had been asked, but that the treasurer should be ordered to pay 25 each to such of the proprietary subscribers as should be willing to accept the same. A room in the Municipal Offices having been kindly placed at the disposal of the council by the Chamber Estate Committee of the Corporation of Nottingham, free of rent, the library has been recently removed thereto. The council trust when the library has been reorganised in its new quarters that it will be found of great practical service to the Profession, especially as it is intended to add to it from time to time as funds permit, not merely reports, but leading text books.

CONVEYANCING CHARGES.—The Council, feeling it would be a great advantage if some uniform rate of ad valorem charges in conveyancing matters could be generally adopted in Nottingham, appointed a committee to consider the question, and, if thought practicable, to prepare a scale of charges which the Council might recommend for adoption. Six meetings of the committee were held and a scale of charges, so far as related to mortgages was partly framed, when, on the issue of the annual report of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, it appeared that the council of that society, after communication with the principal provincial law societies, were about to issue a revised scale of conveyancing charges, which at that time was before the Lord Chancellor for his approval. The committee accordingly reported to the Council that it would be advisable for the matter to stand over until after the publication of such revised scale, in which opinion the Council concurred, considering that the adoption of a "general" scale would be more advantageous than that of a "local" one.

CONDITIONS OF SALE.—The Council having found that in some towns, particularly in Birmingham, great advantage had accrued both to the Profession and to the public, by the use of a form of conditions applicable to sales by auction of property whether of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold tenure, it was resolved to instruct counsel to settle a similar form for this society. The committee appointed to carry out this resolution accordingly instructed Mr. William Barber, of 19, Old-square, Lincoln's-inn, to settle a form, and his conditions are recommended for adoption by the Profession in this locality.

PARLIAMENTARY BILLS.—The council directed that there should be obtained for its use a print of all public Bills submitted to the Houses of Parliament, and appointed a committee to pursue the same and to report upon those which should be of importance or interest to the legal profession. A large number of prints of Bills were received by the secretary, and laid before the committee, but only a very small proportion were capable of being the subject of a report. The council accordingly, upon the recommendation of the committee, decided to ask the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom to call the attention of the various provincial law societies to any measures that from time to time might require to be considered and watched in their passage through Parliament. The Incorporated Law Society have complied with the suggestion.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT.—At its April meeting the council appointed a committee to consider and report upon the present state and proposed amendment of the bankruptcy law. No report has been presented by the committee to the council, as the Bill introduced in Parliament last year by the Lord Chancellor was withdrawn, but there is every probability that a similar Bill will be introduced in the coming Session which will require the attention of the succeeding council. The council is of opinion that one of the most valuable points on the Bill of last Session was a return to the policy of official supervision, believing that thereby a debtor's estate will be wound-up with greater rapidity and with less expense than by the system introduced by the Act of 1869, which experience has shown is open to much abuse.

LOCAL PRIZE.—The council, believing that the promotion of the education of articled clerks is within the objects of this society, decided to offer a prize for competition at the final examination. The terms upon which this prize was to be offered will be ascertained from the resolution which was passed at the ordinary general meeting of the members of the society, held on the 26th July 1876. A copy of the resolution having been laid before the council of the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, a communication was received stating that the examiners at the several final examinations in each year had no means of ascertaining the required particulars of relative merit amongst the students of the entire year, and, therefore, could not assist in the adjudication of an annual prize. The council thereupon requested the president to communicate with the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, to ascertain if there is any way in which this difficulty can be overcome. The president has not yet reported the result of his inquiries.

POINTS OF PRACTICE.—The attention of the council has been called on several occasions during the past year to the diversity of the rules of practice adopted by different members of the Profession in Nottingham. The recommendations passed by the council since the incorporation of the society, and which are set out in the appendix to this report have been adopted by the council after mature consideration, and, in the case of the resolution dated 9th May 1876, after communication with several other law societies.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENCY.—The attention of the council has been called to this subject both by the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom and the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool. As the matter will be brought before the Houses of Parliament during the next session, the council hope, in co-operation with other law societies, to effect such changes in the recommendations of the joint committee of both Houses of Parliament set out in their report, presented to Parliament during last session, as shall prevent the establishment of a new monopoly of Parliamentary practice as proposed by that report.

INFRINGEMENT OF THE ACTS RELATING TO SOLICITORS.—Several cases of infringement of these Acts have been brought before the council during the past year. In one case a prosecution before the town magistrates was instituted by the direction of the council, and a conviction obtained. In others the offenders have been communicated with by the president. The council recommend that the above-mentioned Acts should be strictly enforced, and call upon the Profession to second their efforts by discountenancing all persons who attempt to infringe them.

The President then rose to move the adoption of the report, altered, he said, in the addition of the name of Mr. George Freeth, amongst those who had given up their interests in the law library without any compensation, and doing so, he remarked that he could not but congratulate the society upon the position which it stood in after only eighteen months' existence. They numbered, according to the report, sixty-four members, which he thought showed a remarkable success in so short a time. He thought they might congratulate themselves that their anticipations had been entirely fulfilled since their commencement in every respect, viz., as a representative society, as a consulting society, and as a defence society. They had been able, as a representative society, to derive some valuable information from societies in other places, and especially they had gained great advantages through their connection with the Incorporated Law Society of London, and he thought they ought to acknowledge to that society the courtesy it had shown in appointing their president as an extraordinary member of their council. The special advantages they derived was that they were in weekly communication with the London Society. Through that connection there was no need to go to the expense of new bills brought into Parliament, and that was a great saving to the members. As a consulting society, they had had the pleasure and advantage of attending their meetings, and thought all must be well satisfied with the work done. The speaker also referred to the "conditions of sale," proposed by the society, with respect to property, and said they were to the benefit of all, and made things equal for both vendor and purchaser. They would see that payment by commission, by the report, stood over, on account of the Law Society in London having it under their notice, and they (the Nottingham Society) thought it better to adopt a general scale than a local one. Another important subject was the question of the bankruptcy laws, and they had occupied a good deal of their attention, but as the Bill brought forward in Parliament was withdrawn, there was an end of the matter for the present, but as it would probably be introduced next session, he was sure the new council would give it every attention. In the defensive, he thought the council had done good work during the year, and there were some matters which were not mentioned in the newspapers, and which required dealing with in another way. The speaker, in conclusion, condemned what might be termed quack lawyers, and said cheap law was the dearest in the end. He had great pleasure in proposing the adoption of the report, and trusted they would be as successful in the future as they had been in the past. (Applause.)

Mr. Watson seconded the adoption of the report, and took occasion to propose a vote of thanks to the president, which that gentleman briefly acknowledged, but declined to accept a second term of office.

Votes of thanks to the Incorporated Law Society in London, and Mr. Williams, hon. sec. of the Nottingham Branch, were cordially accorded.

The following officers were next elected for the ensuing year:—President, Mr. John Watson; vice-president, Mr. Henry Wing; treasurer, Mr. Charles Butlin (re-elected); honorary secretary, Mr. Williams (re-elected). The following were elected on the Board of Council:—Messrs. Carter, Eking, Enfield, Fraser, Maples, Martin, G. B. Rothera, and Roby Thorpe. Auditors:—Messrs. Cartwright and Wyles.

This concluded the business, and the meeting was brought to a close.

He was born in the year 1795, and was educated at New College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1816, and proceeded M.A. in due course. He was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple in Trinity Term 1821, and practised for many years as a conveyancer in New-square, Lincoln's-inn. He was appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1854, and was for some time Chief Commissioner of Charitable Trusts, from which office he retired about five years ago, when he was sworn a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council. Mr. Peter Erle married Miss Mary Fearon.

J. JERWOOD, ESQ.

THE late James Jerwood, Esq., barrister-at-law, and some time Recorder of South Molton, Devon, who died at Exeter on the 18th ult., was born about the commencement of the present century, at Ploughhill, in North Devon, and came of humble parentage. Educated in the school of his native village, he afterwards became usher in the grammar school at Honiton, and in due course went to Cambridge, and entered at St. John's College, where he graduated B.A. in 1831, and proceeded M.A. in 1842. Called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple in Trinity Term, 1836, he joining the Western Circuit, practised occasionally at the Devon and Exeter sessions. He was for some time employed as an assistant tithe commissioner, and had been for many years, down to the time of his decease, Recorder of South Molton. Mr. Jerwood was a Fellow of many literary and scientific societies. He was the author of a treatise "On the Rights to the Sea Shores and Navigable Rivers," of numerous articles in the Law Magazine and Review, and other publications; and also of various pamphlets on scientific subjects.

THE late John Stratford Collings, Esq., barrister-at-law, of Wythall Walford, near Ross, Herefordshire, who died on the 1st inst., after a long illness, in the sixty-second year of his age, was the eldest son of the late John Stratford Collings, Esq., of Wythall Walford, by his marriage with Edith, daughter of Philip Jones, Esq., of The Clere, Herefordshire. He was born in the year 1815, and was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1843. He was called to the Bar by the honourable society of Gray's-inn, in Easter Term 1849, and practised for some time as an equity draftsman and conveyancer. He was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Hereford, and was twice married, first, in 1848, to Ellen, daughter of Mr. John Lloyd, of Lloydsborough, county Tipperary, and secondly, in 1858, to Mary Jane, daughter of the Rev. John Jones, of Langstone Court, Herefordshire, and widow of Charles J. Vaux, Esq. He has left a family to lament his loss.

H. T. J. MACNAMARA, ESQ.

THE late Henry Tyrwhitt Jones Macnamara, Esq., barrister-at-law, one of her Majesty's railway commissioners, who died on the 2nd inst., at his residence in Linden Gardens, Bayswater, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, was the son of Frederick Heyes Macnamara, Esq., of the 52nd regiment, and was born in the year 1820. He was educated at the Grammar School, at Lichfield, and was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn, in Michaelmas Term 1849 (having previously to that time practiced with success as a special pleader), and joined the Oxford Circuit, whereon for many years he enjoyed a large business as a junior. In 1864 he was appointed Recorder of Reading, and he was nominated one of the railway commissioners, in conjunction with Sir Frederick Peel and Mr. Price, upon the establishment of that tribunal by Lord Aberdare, in 1873, having held for a short time previously and up to that date, the County Court Judgeship for the borough of Marylebone. By the death of Mr. Macnamara the public and the Profession have sustained a great loss; and in his person one who could ill be spared from a laborious and responsible post, has passed away. When he accepted the post of first legal member of her Majesty's Commission of Railway and Canal Traffic, it was admitted by the Profession generally, and indeed by all who knew him, that a most fitting selection had been made. The deceased gentleman married Miss Eliza Morgan, daughter of the late Walter Morgan, Esq., of Merthyr Tydvil, Glamorgan-shire.

SAUNDERS'S TREATISE ON WARRANTIES, &c.

A Treatise on the Law of Warranties and Representations upon the Sale of Personal Chattels by THOMAS W. SAUNDERS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Recorder of Bath. Price 6s.

"This little volume on an important practical subject, seems to us very well adapted for chamber use by both branches of the Profession. Warranties, express and implied, always afford a large proportion of the business in London and the assizes, and a compact little work, such as Mr. Saunders's, was needed, because, as the writer fairly says, that although the subject is mentioned in some large text-books in connection with the general law of contracts, a more detailed statement of the law was needed. The quotations given by the author from the numerous cases cited on the subject show much diligence and care in the compilation of this treatise, and largely increases its value as an authority. The law on implied warranties is but little understood outside the Profession, hence many merchants and manufacturers find themselves at law, for an alleged want of due care in the manufacture of an article, they are held to have given such an implied warranty, as reasonably fit for a particular purpose. There are upwards of a hundred cases cited, and judgments referred to. One very useful chapter explaining briefly and clearly the law of warranties by servants and agents, and when the masters are liable for their frauds. We also note useful remarks on the question of returning goods, and rules or conditions at the end of the whole, we confidently recommend this little book to our readers."—Law Magazine.

within the jurisdiction—an affidavit, that is, of material facts, showing that the action is substantial. The case is that of The Great Australian Gold Mining Company v. Martin.

THE CHIEF JUDGE in BANKRUPTCY has decided that as yet no custom for letting furniture on hire sufficient to defeat the order and disposition clause in the Bankruptcy Act has been proved.

WE recently intimated that the case of Ex parte Attwater; re Turner (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 682), would be carried to the House of Lords. The Court of Appeal has, however, refused the leave, on the ground that the point of law involved is not one of difficulty. Lord Justice JAMES intimated that the decision might affect a large number of bills of sale, and this is, no doubt, the case, because the decision is that a holder of a bill of sale who takes possession before the act of bankruptcy upon which his grantor is adjudicated or liquidated, is nevertheless liable to lose his security by relation back of the title of the trustee to a prior secret act of bankruptcy. The point struck us as one of great importance, having regard to sects. 94 & 95 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, but when a Court of Appeal says that there is nothing in it, we, of course, must be mistaken.

THE County Court Bill, to which we recently referred as being in contemplation, has been printed. It proposes to give County Court Judges all the powers and jurisdiction of a Judge of the High Court. The largest powers of removal from the County Court to the High Court, and vice versa, are also proposed. The Bill creates a new functionary, called a "judicial registrar," who is to have £1200 a year and expenses. They are to have districts, as the Judges now have, whilst the Judges themselves are to sit in principal centres. Appeals are to lie to the High Court in all matters in which appeals now lie. It is also proposed that if an action is begun in the High Court for a money demand, and a sum not exceeding £50 is recovered, the costs shall be such only as would have been allowed in the County Court. The Judges' salaries, it is proposed, should be increased by £300, but in no case to exceed £1800.

In another column we give a brief report of a case heard on Monday before the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, which was an appeal against an order restraining the creditor from continuing an action against a compounding debtor. The debtor had tendered the creditor a composition on one-third of the amount claimed, which the creditor refused, and proceeded at law. All the other creditors were paid. Although this was purely a question between the particular creditor and the debtor, the CHIEF JUDGE referred to sect. 72 of the Act as an argument why the action should be restrained, that section giving the Court of Bankruptcy full power to deal with such a question. This is the first time this section has been used for this purpose. It might with equal force have been referred to in all the cases cited in argument by the counsel for the appellant—but it was not.

It is significant of the interest which is taken in legal administration by the public when such papers as the Times and the Pall Mall Gazette devote their space to the discussion of such questions as the duties of the referees and the masters respectively. The present position of the practice relating to arbitrations is in the highest degree unsatisfactory. The common law masters have their powers most shamefully misapplied, or not applied at all, and when employed their work is too frequently that which official referees were expressly appointed to do. Why all references except those sent to special referees should not go to official referees it is not easy to understand. It being optional with the suitor to go to a referee or a master, there are several reasons, which we refrain from mentioning, why the latter is preferred. The object of legislation, however, should be to map out a course which suitors must take, and then that course should be made acceptable by appointments as far as possible unexceptionable.

In Twycross v. Grant judgment has been given for the plaintiff for the whole value of the shares bought by him. This may be satisfactory, especially to the plaintiff, but the judgment is unsatisfactory from a legal point of view, in that it offers no solution of the meaning of sect. 38 of the Companies' Act 1867. We venture to suggest one, neither inconsistent with the decisions nor doing violence to its language. The section is to apply to "any contract entered into by the company (that is, by a meeting of its shareholders), or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof (who are the only persons who can enter into contracts of any importance on its behalf), before the issue of the prospectus or notice, whether subject to adoption by the directors or the company, or otherwise (that is, whether concluded or made subject to ratification by the articles of association)." A contract between a vendor and an intended promoter need not be disclosed; but if before its completion the intended promoter becomes an actual one, by the company coming into existence, then the section attaches.

The Law and the Lawyers.

WE report to-day an important decision of the Court of Appeal at Lincoln's-inn, delivered on the 2nd inst. on Order XI. r. 3, which relates to the service of writs out of the jurisdiction. It is now decided that to justify the making of an order for service, the court must have an affidavit of the cause of action arising

A fortiori, if matters have gone further before the promoter has bought the property he intends to sell to the company. On the other hand, until a company comes into existence the Companies Acts have nothing to act upon, and therefore no operation, and the rule of caveat emptor applies. The construction is not satisfactory, because in the present case the judgment would be wrong; but the Legislature should have fixed a time within which contracts made should be disclosed. We hope the Bill introduced by Sir H. JACKSON, Q.C. and others this session will remedy this omission, and obviate the necessity of any more causes célèbres upon section 38.

THE rules of the old Court of Chancery are rapidly being extended to the Common Law Division. Mr. Justice LINDLEY, in the case of Norris v. Beasley, drew up an order upon an application made to the Common Pleas Division, in which he introduced the principle of giving only one set of costs—a thing hitherto unheard of at Westminster. The action was upon a bill of exchange: the defences were, in effect, no consideration, and that the defendant was only a trustee. The application in question was made to discharge an order of the master under Order XVI., rr. 18 and 21, giving directions as to the mode of trial where a third party had been served. The party so served was the principal of the defendant, and claimed to be allowed to defend the action. He was not allowed to be made a party under rule 13; but he was permitted under the other rules, cited above, to come before the court, so as to be enabled to defend the action in case his agent should compromise or abandon it; upon these terms he was to join in the pleadings and be represented by the counsel of his agent, to be liable with his agent for costs if unsuccessful; and principal and agent were to have but one set of costs if successful.

THE "hurry of Nisi Prius" must not be now considered an excuse for expounding the law inaccurately, and we consider that there is imposed upon Judges when sitting with juries as serious an obligation to be familiar with recent decisions upon matters of principle as when sitting in banco. On this ground we regret to observe that in so important a case as Milissich v. Lloyds, arising out of a branch of law so familiar as the law of libel, Lord COLERIDGE should have exposed himself to observation by the Court of Appeal. Lord Justice MELLISH said: "At the trial the defence was raised that the report was protected, but Lord COLERIDGE appeared to have expressed an opinion that Lloyds could not have the same privilege as a newspaper in its ordinary publication of reports, and also expressed an opinion that the evidence was not given except on the report of the speech of the prosecuting counsel and the summing-up of the Judge; therefore, in law, it could not be fair. I cannot concur, however, in either of these propositions, and it appears to me they are contrary to the law as laid down on the latest authorities." Judges in the present day are too fond of the remark—"If I am wrong you can set me right on appeal;" but an appeal is a very unsatisfactory method of correcting a statement of law for which there was originally no foundation. Had Lord COLERIDGE's direction remained as a Nisi Prius decision it might have caused much mischief. According to his Lordship a very limited privilege only could be claimed by Lloyds. The Court of Appeal say that their privilege in publishing a pamphlet is co-extensive with that of a newspaper. Lord COLERIDGE said that in publishing a report of judicial proceedings they must set out the evidence. The Court of Appeal say they may give a summary as newspapers do in their reports. So the case goes back to a new trial on the question whether the report in question was fair or unfair—a very simple issue of fact.

MR. Justice LUSH delivered the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in the case of the Sheffield Nickel and Plate Company v. Unwin on the 6th inst., in which case a highly important branch of the law relating to limited companies was discussed. The plaintiffs brought an action against their late manager upon a guarantee. The defendant had sold to the company his business as manufacturer of electro plate and other wares, as well as his patents, and guaranteeing a dividend of 15 per cent. upon the paid-up capital for five years from the year 1873. The defence was that by a resolution of the company, sanctioned by an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders and duly confirmed, as required by the Companies Act 1862, the company agreed to release him from all liability under the guarantee upon the performance of certain conditions which he had duly performed. The company denied the performance, and set up in the reply that such an agreement was ultra vires and void. Upon this second point the court decided in favour of the defendant. "The resolution," said Mr. Justice LUSH, who delivered the judgment of the court, "in no way affects the constitution of the company, as defined by the articles of association; but being, as it undoubtedly was, bonâ fide on the part of the shareholders and directors, who considered that they were doing their best for their own 'interests and those of the company,' it was in furtherance of the main object of the company." The court, however, doubted whether such an arrangement would have been within the power of the directors alone; but had no such doubt that it was within the power of the company, since the agreement to guarantee 15 per cent. could not be put higher than a regulation, which, under the 50th section of the Companies' Act 1862, the company had power to repeal or alter. Their Lordships were in favour of the defendant upon the other question. Hence the action was held to be unmain- tainable. The decision is one which would well bear a more lengthy examination, but it is sufficient for our present purpose to have touched briefly upon the question of ultra vires which was raised.

THE recent case of Metcalf v. Britannia Ironworks Company (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. D. 613) affords an interesting illustration of the conflict of a liberal mind with the strict law which is not obviously strict justice. The right to pro rata freight where only part of a voyage has been performed is admitted in America; it is absolutely denied in England, unless the goods owner takes possession at a port short of the destination. In Metcalf's case the ship could not get into the port of destination, owing to a block of the river by ice. The captain landed and warehoused the cargo thirty miles short of the port, and the consignees claimed it, and it was delivered to them subject to the captain's claim for freight. Justices MELLOR and LUSH held that he was not entitled to pro rata freight, and the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE held that he was. It would be matter for congratulation if this case were carried to the House of Lords, and that tribunal could see its way to overruling Dr. Lushington's decision in the case of the Soblomsten, upon the authority of which the Queen's Bench Division placed much reliance in Metcalf's case.

IN old law books the right of the Crown to gold and silver mines when discovered in this country is strongly insisted upon. In Wooley v. The Attorney-General of Victoria, which was decided in the Privy Council on the 6th inst., an important point was decided with respect to the application of this part of the Sovereign's prerogative to the Colonies. The question before the court was whether upon a sale of waste Crown lands in the colony of Victoria, the gold in such lands passed to the grantee of the lands without express words to that effect. A parcel of Crown land was granted to certain individuals for a sum paid to the Colonial Treasury. The only reservation in the grant was in respect of land required for public ways, canals, and railways, and certain materials for the construction and repairs of roads, drains, fences, and so on. No gold or other mine had been opened on the spot at the time of the grant. Litigation, which need not be detailed here, having arisen with reference to the discovery of gold in the land, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL stepped in and claimed for the QUEEN all gold in the land vested in the appellants. This claim was resisted by the appellants, on the ground that by the grant of the lands the QUEEN had divested herself of all rights to the mineral. A demurrer was allowed by the Supreme Court, which decided that a grant by the Crown of lands in England would not pass gold or silver mines unless express words were used, and that all the reasons stated for the existence of the right in England applied equally to grants of Crown land in the colonies. In the Privy Council, it was urged on behalf of the appellants that the ratio decidendi of the decisions in England upon which the Supreme Court of Victoria based its judgment, was wholly inapplicable to the colony of Victoria. When the principle was established in England, it was urged grants by the Crown of its lands impoverished the Crown. Such grants were made from favour and without consideration. In Victoria, on the other hand, grants from the Crown had always enriched the Crown. The appeal was dismissed. Grantees of Crown lands in the gold districts must consequently be careful in future to have express words inserted in the conveyance if they wish to have the benefit of any gold or silver which may be discovered in that land.

IN the case of Broadhead v. Holdsworth, the Exchequer Division a few days ago decided an important point under the Vaccination Acts. The whole difficulty in the case arose from a strange inconsistency in the legislation on the subject. The respondent was charged before justices under sect. 7 of the Vaccination Amendment Act 1871, for not transmitting to the vaccinating officer a certificate that his child had had the smallpox. That section enacts that "Every certificate of a child being unfit for or insusceptible of successful vaccination, if given by any medical practitioner other than by a public vaccinator, shall be transmitted by the parent of such child to the vaccination officer; . . ." and any person who fails to comply with any provision of this section is made liable to a penalty. The Justices, however, were of opinion that no obligation was imposed on the parent to transmit a certificate that his child had had smallpox, and discharged the respondent. That decision was upheld by the Exchequer Division. The difficulty in the case arose in this way: By sect. 20 of the principal Vaccination Act 1867, "If any public vaccinator or medical practitioner shall find that a child whom he has three times unsuccessfully vaccinated is insusceptible of successful vaccination, or that a child brought to him for vaccination has already had the smallpox, he shall deliver to the parent a certificate according to the form in the schedule hereto marked C, or to the like effect." The form C in the schedule, however, treats not only the case of three unsuccessful attempts at vaccination, as a case of "insusceptibility of successful vaccination," but also puts that of a child who has had the smallpox in the same category. It is as follows:—

 I, ——— certify that I have ——— times unsuccessfully vaccinated ——— the child of ——— [or that the child has already had the smallpox, as the case may be], and I am of opinion that such child is insusceptible of successful vaccination. But by sect. 15 of the Amendment Act 1871, power is given to the Poor Law Board to alter, amend, or add to the forms in the schedule to the principal Act. They accordingly, by virtue of that power, drew up a form in lieu of form C in that schedule. The form drawn up by them was a certificate in the alternative—either to the effect that "the child has been ——— times unsuccessfully vaccinated, and is therefore, in the opinion of the public vaccinator, insusceptible of successful vaccination," or that "the child has had the smallpox." It will be seen that here the case of three unsuccessful vaccinations is alone treated as a case of "insusceptibility," while in the original form both that and the case of a child who has had the smallpox were so treated. It thus became somewhat difficult to determine whether the Legislature intended that the words of sect. 7, "insusceptibility of successful vaccination," should include the case of a child who has had the smallpox. But the court (CLEASBY and POLLOCK, BB.) held that the case under discussion was clearly a casus omissus, and one, therefore, which they could not supply in an Act creating an offence, and that it is not necessary, therefore, for a parent to transmit a certificate that his child has had the smallpox.

An interesting question of costs, when money has been paid into court, has been decided in the case of Langridge v. Campbell, by the Exchequer Division. The action was for goods sold and delivered and for work done, the plaintiff in his writ claiming a sum of 370*l.* odd. The defendant entered an appearance to the action, but no pleadings were delivered on either side, and, in fact, there the action stopped, and on the 21st Dec. an order was made to refer the matters in dispute to arbitration. On the 19th Feb. the defendant paid 200*l.* into court, and at the time of doing so gave notice to the plaintiff in the form given in Appendix B. of the Judicature Act that he had done so, averring in his notice "that the sum was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim." This sum the plaintiff took out of court under Order XXX., rule 3, but gave no notice to the defendant under rule 4 of that order that he took it out in satisfaction of the cause of action in respect of which it was paid in, nor did he take any further steps in regard to it. Subsequently, by an order of Baron POLLOCK an arbitrator was appointed in the reference before agreed to, and the terms as to costs in the order of reference were that "the costs of the cause should abide the event, the costs of the reference to be in the discretion of the arbitrator." The arbitrator by his award decided that the £200 paid into court was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, and divided the costs of the reference between the parties. On the 20th Sept. Baron HUNDLISTON made an order that the defendant sign judgment, and accordingly on the 29th judgment was entered that the plaintiff recover nothing, and that the defendant recover his costs taxed. But when the bill of costs came before the Master for taxation, the Master allowed the plaintiff his costs up to time of payment into court. Against that order the defendant appealed to Mr. Justice HAWKINS at Chambers, and upon his refusal to set aside the Master's order, he appealed to the Exchequer Division. On behalf of the defendant it was urged that, inasmuch as the money had been paid into court generally, and the plaintiff had not taken it out in satisfaction, the plaintiff was not entitled to his costs incurred prior to the payment into court; and in support of that contention the principles laid down in the cases of Rumbelow v. Whalley (16 Q. B. 397) and Harrison v. Watt (16 M. W. 316) were relied on, the principles in both those cases not having been affected either by the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, sect. 73, or by Order XXX. of the Judicature Act. This view the court upheld, and decided that inasmuch as the plaintiff had not taken the sum out of court in satisfaction of his claim, he continued the action at his peril, and, as he had failed to recover more than the sum paid in, he had lost his right to his costs. The whole difficulty arose from the fact of there being no pleadings in the case, and the LORD CHIEF BARON was cautious enough to state in distinct terms that his decision must not be considered as affecting any future case which might come before him in which the same question might arise on the pleadings. This at least, however, seems clear from the decision, that the principles laid down in the cases above mentioned are equally binding under the Judicature Act as they were before that Act was passed, and that the law, therefore, to that extent may be considered as settled on this subject.

THE LEGAL ASPECT OF SPIRITUALISM.

In the recent case of Monck v. Hilton, the appellant had been convicted by the magistrates as a rogue and vagabond under sect. 4 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, for "using subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on Her Majesty's subjects," and he was sentenced to three months imprisonment with hard labour. In the case on appeal it was found that Monck was an impostor, and the sole question for the court was whether the case as proved before the magistrates properly came within the words of the Act.

The question was by no means free from doubt, and Mr. Matthews, Q.C., in an exhaustive argument in support of the appeal, contended with a considerable show of reason that the words were not large enough to include a case of this description. His argument, in fact, exhausts the whole learning on the subject, and is so comprehensive and clear as well to bear careful consideration and analysis. The whole question in the case he argued amounted to this. Whether the subtle devices set out in the case amounted to "palmistry or otherwise." Those words, he said, were clearly intended to point out the statutory offence. The subtle device must either be "palmistry" or something ejusdem generis with palmistry, and the words "or otherwise" could not possibly be read in any other way. With regard to "palmistry" the word is defined in Cowell's Law Dictionary as "a kind of divination, practised by looking on the lines and marks of the fingers and hands. This was practised by the Egyptians mentioned in the Statutes 1 P. & M., c. 4."

In Johnson v. Fenner (33 J. P. 740), the only case which has been decided under this section, it was held that wagering with people and then deceiving them by sleight of hand was not within the section; and from this the learned counsel argued that the case could not possibly be said to fall within the word "palmistry." The question then arose as to what meaning is to be given to the words "or otherwise." He argued that the words must be read according to the ordinary rules of construction, and that they must therefore include something ejusdem generis with palmistry, such as chiromancy and physiognomy. Sir Thomas Brown in his "Vulgar Errors" book 5, c. 24, p. 180, also mentions rhabdromancy. "As for the divination or decision from the staff, it is an augural relic, and the practice thereof is accused by God himself. My people ask counsel of their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them." That, however, as Mr. Matthews admitted, can hardly be said to be ejusdem generis with palmistry, but the two former can well be said to be so. In confirmation of his argument on this head Mr. Matthews then proceeded to show that the Legislature throughout the course of a long series of statutes has invariably made a strong distinction between palmistry and the offence of conjuration or the invoking of evil spirits. And certainly his argument in this respect was by no means unpalatable. The Act under which Monck was convicted forms one of a long series of statutes against the Egyptians, commencing as early as 22 Henry 8, c. 10, by which the Egyptians were punished if they imposed upon people by means of palmistry, physiognomy, chiromancy, or by other means of the same nature. It is clear that in these offences nothing supernatural was implied, there was no calling up of evil spirits. That offence was dealt with by another series of statutes, showing, he argued, that the Legislature intended to make a complete distinction between the offences committed by the Egyptians and the more grave offence of conjuration or calling up of evil spirits. The first series of statutes begins with the Act of 22 Henry 8, c. 10, entitled "An Act concerning outlandish people calling themselves Egyptians." That Act, after reciting that "forasmuch as before this time divers and many outlandish people, calling themselves Egyptians, have come into this realm, and gone from shire to shire, and used great, subtle, and crafty means to deceive the people, bearing them in hand, that they by palmistry could tell men's and women's fortunes," &c., proceeds to prohibit their coming into this kingdom. In 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 4, these provisions are repeated, and the same words are employed in that statute, and further confirmed by 5 Eliz., c. 20.

A clause very similar in words to the recital in 22 Henry 8, c. 10, was introduced into the Vagrant Acts in the reign of Geo. II. By 17 Geo. 2, c. 5, s. 2, "All persons pretending to be gipsies, or wandering in the habit or form of Egyptians, or pretending to have skill in physiognomy, palmistry, or like crafty science, or pretending to tell fortunes, or using any subtle crafts to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects, shall be deemed rogues and vagabonds within the true intent and meaning of this Act." This becomes somewhat altered in 3 Geo. 4, c. 40, s. 5, by which 17 Geo. 2, c. 5, s. 2 was repealed. There the words are: "All persons pretending to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means or device by palmistry, or otherwise to deceive or impose on any of His Majesty's subjects, shall be deemed to be rogues and vagabonds." Then came the Act of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4, upon which the question turns, and by which all previous Acts as to rogues and vagabonds were repealed. Now, it will be seen that none of these statutes deal with anything in the nature of conjuration or calling up of evil spirits. These offences were dealt with by the second series of statutes before alluded to, commencing with 3 Henry 8, c. 8. But before proceeding to deal with these it may be as well to give the definition of conjuration given in Cowell's Law Dictionary. It is as follows: "In our common law it is specially used for such as have personal conference with the devil or evil spirits, to know any secret, or to effect any purpose, and the difference between conjuration and witchcraft seems to be this: That the one by prayers and invocations of God's powerful name, compels the devil to say, or do what he commandeth him; the other dealeth rather by a friendly and voluntary conference and agreement between him or her and the devil, or familiar to have her or his desires or turns served." By 3 Henry 8, c. 8, the first of the second series of statutes, "It shall be felony to practice or cause to be practiced, conjuration, witchcraft, enchantment, or sorcery, to get money." This Act was followed by 5 Eliz. c. 16, which, in its turn, was followed by 1 Jac. 1, c. 12.

In all these statutes the offences against which they were levelled were those of conjuration, witchcraft, enchantment, and sorcery; but in the reign of George II. the belief in magic and witchcraft had disappeared to so large an extent that by the Act of 9 Geo. 2, c. 5, sects. 3, 4, the prosecution for offences of this kind was abolished, and in lieu thereof the pretence was made criminal.

This last Act is still in force, and Mr. Matthews contended that Monck should have been indicted under that Act, if he could be indicted under any; and certainly the fact of that Act still being in existence is a strong argument in favour of the contention that the offence of conjuration was not intended to be dealt with by 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, sect. 4.

But the Court held that the words of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4, could not be so restricted, that the obvious intention of the Legislature was to provide against all impostures by subtle device, means, or craft, whether by palmistry or in any other way.

This decision may at first sight be regarded as being opposed to the general rule of construction that general words must be construed with reference to the particular words which precede them; but when the section is carefully read, the decision seems to us to be quite in accordance with the spirit and intention of the Act. It may, also, be said to give a very wide and comprehensive scope to the Vagrant Act; but no one will quarrel with the decision in that respect.

SURVIVORS AND SURVIVORSHIP.

On reading the head note of the recent case in Re Dawes's Trust, before Sir R. Malins, as appearing in L. Rep. 4 Ch. Div. 210, we become strongly impressed with the idea that the learned Vice-Chancellor, so far as lay in his power, was commanding us "to renew our griefs." In our simplicity we had fondly supposed that where individuals or a class of persons were designated to take as "survivors" or "surviving," it had been settled as the outcome of a very long controversy by many cases, and notably by Cripps v. Wolcott (4 Mad. 11); Young v. Robertson (8 Jur. N. S. 919); and Re Gregson's Trusts (2 De G. J. & S. 428), that the survivorship was to be referred primâ facie to the death of the tenant for life or other period when the class was entitled to possession or distribution of the estate or fund the subject of gift, and not to the death of the testator. A careful reference to the facts in Re Dawes, confirms our impression that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor entirely militates against what we had previously considered to be the settled law on the subject, and we cannot help thinking that the reasons of the Vice-Chancellor in support of his decision are quite delusive. The headnote to which we have referred, and which states the case with sufficient correctness, runs as follows: "A testator gave a sum of stock to trustees, the interest to be paid to A. for life, and, after his death, the capital to be divided amongst the children of testator's late daughter B. or their descendants, but should there be none of them surviving, then the capital to be equally divided amongst such other grandchildren as he might then have living, or in default thereof to his legal representative. B. had seven children, three of whom died without children in the lifetime of the testator; of the remaining four one alone survived A., the tenant for life; three died before A., and only one of these three left issue. Held, that the words 'should there be none of them surviving' referred to the testator's death, and that the children of B., who survived the testator, took vested interests." The Vice-Chancellor, in his judgment, says: "This is a gift to children in remainder after the death of the tenant for life. The rule of law is that all gifts are to vest as early as possible, and the rule also is that where there is a gift to A., and after his death to his children, it vests in the children of A. in existence at the testator's death, subject to be partially divested in favour of children coming into existence during the life of A., and the words in the will, 'should there be none of them surviving,' must be referred to the testator's death." The Vice-Chancellor is then reported to say, that he considered his decision in accordance with Lainson v. Lainson (5 De M. & G. 754), and his own previous decision in Jull v. Jacobs (L. Rep. 3, Ch. Div. 703).

Accepting the Vice-Chancellor's statement of the general rule as to the vesting of remainders and gifts in the nature of remainders as correct, we can by no means agree that the words introducing the gift over "should there be none of them surviving," were merely intended to provide against lapse. In our judgment they operate to divest the shares of children or their descendants in case no child or descendant survived the tenant for life. As stated by Lord Hatherley in reversing a somewhat similar decision of Sir R. Malins, in Bowers v. Bowers (23 L. T. Rep. N.S. 35; L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 244), "There have been many cases in which the court has said that to refer a clause providing for the divesting of a share to the time of a testator's own death, so as to make it merely a provision against lapse, is not a natural construction. It is not primâ facie to be supposed that he contemplated the death of the objects of his bounty in his lifetime, but he is to be considered as contemplating their death at some later period, unless he uses language which shows that he is referring to the time of his own death."

Against the above canon of construction the Vice-Chancellor's decision in Re Dawes seems clearly to offend. As to the decisions which he cites, we regard them as altogether irrelevant, since in the language under construction in the case of Lainson v. Lainson (ubi sup.), the words "survivors," or "surviving," or "survivorship," or any analogous words were not employed, while in the case of Jull v. Jacobs, though there was a gift to "my surviving children," the context was such as to render it impossible to refer the survivorship to any period other than the testator's own death. In the view we take the persons entitled were the children of B., who survived the testator, and died without issue in the lifetime of A., the tenant for life, each taking one fourth, and the issue of the child who died leaving issue taking the remaining fourth. The cases of Hervey v. McLaughlin (1 Price 264) and Salisbury v. Petty (3 Hare 86) support this construction.

THE JUDGES AND THE JUDICATURE ACTS.

PARLIAMENT has once more assembled, and the attention of the House is to be shortly called to the state of business in our courts. That there is a very considerable block of causes in the various divisions cannot be denied, but whether it is due to the Judicature Acts, or whether it is not an old sore which requires time to heal, may well be questioned. The Master of the Rolls is reported to have said that there is hardly enough work in the Chancery Division to keep the present staff of Vice-Chancellors employed, if the causes entered there were such as ought properly to be placed for trial in that division; and it is probably true enough, that if the list were to undergo careful examination, the remark of Sir George Jessel would prove to be well founded. But whether this be true or not, some remedy ought certainly to be found. Suitors ought to be allowed to try their cases in any division they please, unless good cause can be shown to the contrary; and if the machinery of the Chancery Division is found to work better than the Common Law Divisions, it is only fair that they should be allowed to avail themselves of it.

The state of business in the common law divisions admits of somewhat different considerations. That there are considerable arrears is undeniable, but they have considerably decreased on the whole since the operation of the Judicature Acts, and it is fairly probable that they may be reduced to a minimum with the present staff, if more room were provided and judicial labour better distributed. It must be remembered that the new system has not as yet been fairly tested, and certainly has been somewhat severely tried. The Franconia case retarded the business of the various divisions for a long period, and the operation of the Winter Assizes Act made the last sittings shorter than they would otherwise have been. But, notwithstanding all that has been said, the arrears in banc are infinitely less than ever used to be the case, and such as there are are almost entirely to be found in what is known as the New Trial Paper. But the cases entered in this list should henceforward decrease in a marked manner, owing to the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of last session, under which a great many cases which found their way to the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions, will go straight to the Court of Appeal. The provisions, too, of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act have received a somewhat extraordinary, because unlooked-for, interpretation. Under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59, s. 17, "Every action and proceeding in the High Court of Justice, and all business arising out of the same, except as hereinafter provided, shall, so far as is practicable or convenient, be heard, determined, and disposed of before a single Judge. . . . Provided, nevertheless, that divisional courts of the High Court of Justice may be held for the transaction of any business which may for the time being be ordered by rules of court to be heard by a divisional court," consisting, of two Judges. It is plain enough the Act intended to abolish divisional courts, as far as conveniently could be done, but the rules of court which have been framed and are now in force completely lose sight of the spirit of the provisions contained in the above section. The rules have provided that the following proceedings and matters shall continue to be heard and determined before the Divisional Courts, viz.: (1) proceedings on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division; (2) Appeals from revising barristers; (3) Appeals under sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875; (4) Petition cases in the Exchequer Division; (5) Proceedings directed by any Act of Parliament to be taken before the court and in which the decision of the court is final; (6) Cases stated by the Railway Commissioners; (7) Cases of habeas corpus, in which a Judge directs that the writ be made returnable before a Divisional Court; (8) Special cases where all parties agree that the cause be heard before a Divisional Court; (9) Appeals from Judges' Chambers; (10) Applications for new trials where the action has been tried by a jury; (11) Appeals from inferior courts (see Order 57 A, rule 1. and Order 58 of the Rules of the Supreme Court December 1876). The exceptions include almost everything, so that the only result of this portion of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act has been to reduce a Divisional Court from three to two judges in most cases. Whether the act of the Legislature was wise or not in abolishing the old courts in banco is germane to the present inquiry; but rules of court ought certainly not to be allowed to override the express provisions of an Act of Parliament. Why the special cases, for instance, where all parties agree, are to be heard without distinction before two Judges we are at a loss to conceive. The parties would always be willing to consent, we should imagine, to have a case heard before a divisional court, and the question is whether they should be allowed to do so. Cases on demurrer are, it is true, now to be heard before a single Judge; but even this rule has not been observed in the Queen's Bench Division during the present sittings. On more than one occasion that active and industrious Judge, Mr. Justice Lush, sat with Mr. Justice Mellor, when his presence was not really required, sooner than remain idle; on another occasion, as the Times observed, Mr. Justice Field was called away for some reason from Nisi Prius to sit with Mr. Justice Mellor, when, according even to the rules, only one Judge ought to have constituted the court. During the present sittings, too, the Lord Chief Justice of England has been almost entirely absent from his own court to sit in the Court of Appeal, where at times his assistance was urgently needed. The result has been that the sittings at Nisi Prius have been very irregular both in Middlesex and London, and consequently the arrears have considerably increased.

Now, it is pretty plain from the above remarks that the present arrears are in no slight measure due to the inadequate accommodation, and the want of better arrangements among the judges. We doubt very much whether Parliament will think fit to increase the number of judges at present. That it would be a great improvement to have more Nisi Prius courts sitting than at present cannot be doubted; there is ample employment for three courts daily in every division. At the same time, until the new courts are completed no such reform can be effected; for, as already remarked, the energies of some of our judges are already mis-spent owing to want of room. A great deal, however, might be done at the present time by making the courts in banco subservient to the sittings at Nisi Prius. Complaint is made that so many Judges go circuit, and it has been suggested that, except on one or two circuits, only one Judge should travel circuit, and the services of commissioners be employed more freely. Now, in our opinion, commissioners ought never to be employed except on very special occasions, when it is impossible to finish the work by a limited time. It is no disparagement to these gentlemen, who are often very able and painstaking lawyers, to say that parties who bring their actions in a superior court, in preference to the county courts, in order that they may be presided over by the highest authority, ought not to be compelled to try before an inferior tribunal, whose decision and ruling cannot be expected to have the same weight as those of a Judge.

At present we are in a transition state, and it may be expedient not to be too hasty in tinkering our existing machinery.

A NEW COUNTY COURT BILL.

We recently noticed that a measure of reform to secure the disposal of local legal business in local courts was in preparation with a view to relieve the block of business which is daily getting worse in the High Court of Justice. "A Bill to Amend the Law relating to the Jurisdiction of the County Courts"—which we print in another column—it will be seen, would clearly accomplish that reform. On the day when Mr. J. COWEN, the member for Newcastle, gave notice of his intention to introduce this Bill, Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN gave notice that he would call attention to the delays in the despatch of business in the High Court, and move that the "only way to grapple with the difficulty" is by increasing the number of Judges. Here, then, is a very decided issue—Shall the business be distributed amongst the County Courts, or shall more Judges of the High Court be appointed?

Let us see what are the main principles of Mr. Cowen's Bill. It consists of twenty-nine clauses. Clause 1 proposes to constitute principal County Courts, large districts being assigned to each; clause 4 proposes to give power to Her Majesty to constitute any County Court a principal court. The Bill also contains clauses as to the appointment and salaries of competent judges for these newly-constituted courts. Clause 10 provides for the appointment of "judicial registrars," who are to reside within their circuits, and are not to practice in any way, such appointments to be open to barristers and solicitors. It is stated in an important printed memorandum which accompanies the Bill, "The registrars (as distinguished from the judicial registrars) must of necessity, on the score of expense, continue to be as they now are, solicitors in practice, with the existing restriction on practising in the County Courts of their respective districts. They are in the main an able and efficient body of public servants, and they have performed their multifarious duties in a manner which deserves recognition. It is from these functionaries, in the great commercial and trading centres, that the registrars of the local registries of the High Court will probably be selected, as recommended by the commissioners, and for which provision is made in the Judicature Act 1873."

Judicial registrars are of course to be called upon to undertake much judicial work within certain well defined limits, and, in short, the clauses from 10 to 14 provide a machinery by which the creation of principal County Courts can be proceeded with according to the requirements of each particular part of the country. Proper provision is made for the removal of actions from the principal County Courts to the High Court, and vice versa. The provision in clause 22, to the effect that in matters coming before a principal County Court, motions by the Bar, and cases in which counsel appear, shall have precedence of those in which solicitors appear is, we think, unnecessary. Clause 23 provides an easy mode of appeal to the High Court from a decision of a principal County Court, and while we are not prepared to recommend the adoption of the Bill verbatim et literatim, yet we are convinced that the principles of the Bill deserve support.

The Bill offers an improvement in the administration of justice outside the pale of, and yet in keeping with, the spirit of the Judicature Acts and rules. Its main provisions are not new, but are traced on the lines laid down by the Judicature Commissioners in their second report. We are in a position to state that it has the support of several of the judges of the High Court of Justice, notably of Mr. Baron POLLOCK, who is an authority of the questions raised by Mr. Cowen's measure. Nor must it be supposed that this Bill is the work of laymen; its production is due principally to the labour of lawyers. Lord SELBORNE has approved the principles of the Bill, which is framed to some extent upon the suggestions of Mr. HARRINGTON, the learned County Court Judge, whose scheme for County Court reform we published in our columns last autumn. Mr. JOHN HOLLAMS (one of the most experienced of the Judicature Commissioners) has offered valuable suggestions, which have been incorporated in the Bill, and so also has Mr. DANIEL, Q.C., whose enlightened views on the subject of law reform reflect credit on the whole bench of County Court Judges. We can find no more suitable conclusion to our comments on this Bill than those contained in the printed memorandum to which we have already referred.

The Government will have to face the alternative of applying to Parliament for funds to appoint additional Judges to the High Court, or means must be found to enable the existing Judges to attend to their more important duties in London and the country, by relieving them from spending so much time on minor matters which might properly be tried before branch tribunals. But this involves, and indeed presupposes the existence of tribunals duly organized for the purpose. The Bar may not approve proposals, which are out of harmony with its traditions. It is too patriotic, however, and too sensible to remain permanently hostile. Whatever present arrangements may be made, the ultimate settlement of the question cannot be doubtful. It will not be determined by the convenience of individuals, but by a wise and statesmanlike consideration of the just demands and requirements of the public.

LEGISLATION AND JURIS-PRUDENCE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 9.

JUSTICES OF PEACE, &amp;c. (CLERKS' FEES).

Sir H. SELWYN-IBBETSON asked leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law with respect to the appointment, payment, and fees of clerks of justices of the peace and clerks of special and petty sessions. He said that as far back as 1851 the question and the payment of these clerks by fees instead of salaries was raised, and a clause was passed enabling localities to adopt that mode of payment. The change was obviously desirable in many cases in which the fees were far in excess of the penalty inflicted, or intended to be inflicted by the magistrates, and where this was the case people got an idea that the magistrates were urged to convict by the clerks for the sake of their own profit. More recently, and particularly in 1872, attempts were made to render compulsory the payment of clerks by salary, and almost all the resistance they met with was due to differences of opinion about uniformity of fees, which, however desirable, was practically impossible. The Bill was framed to meet the inevitable differences between rural and populous districts, and would call upon some localities to submit fresh tables of fees to the Home Secretary.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURTS BILL.

A BILL to amend the law relating to the Jurisdiction of the County Courts.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the jurisdiction of the County Courts, and to constitute a limited number of such courts at convenient centres in populous trading and manufacturing localities principal County Courts, with an enlarged jurisdiction, and with extended districts, and to make further provision for the administration of justice within such districts.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The County Courts holden at the centres respectively mentioned in the first column of Schedule A. hereto annexed shall, from and after the commencement of this Act, become and be principal County Courts; and where in such schedule two centres are united together, the County Courts respectively holden at such centres shall, together form one principal County Court.

2. There shall be assigned to every principal County Court constituted by this Act, as a district for the purposes of this Act, the consolidated districts of the County Courts respectively mentioned in the second column of the said schedule hereto. Every principal County Court and the district assigned thereto shall together form a principal County Court circuit under the presidency of one or more judges.

3. From and after the commencement of this Act, all the County Courts comprised within any principal County Court circuit shall become and be subsidiary County Courts affiliated to such principal County Court, as members or branches thereof.

4. Her Majesty may by order in council from time to time direct that any County Court holden at a convenient centre shall, either singly, or together with any other County Court or County Courts, be constituted a principal County Court, and may assign a district thereto; and every County Court so ordered to be constituted as a principal County Court, and the district assigned thereto, shall together form a principal County Court circuit; and every such court shall henceforth be holden as a principal County Court under this Act, and in all respects as if it had been originally constituted under the provisions of this Act.

5. Her Majesty may by order in council from time to time direct that any two or more principal County Courts circuits shall be consolidated and form together one principal County Court circuit; and may alter the boundaries of any principal County Court circuit by extending or diminishing the area of its jurisdiction; and may from time to time appoint that the sittings of any principal County Court shall be holden at other convenient places within the circuit thereof, in addition to the places at which under the provisions of this Act principal County Courts are directed to be holden.

6. The judges of the courts constituted under the provisions of this Act shall be such persons as Her Majesty may be pleased to appoint thereto from the body of the County Court judges, or barristers of not less than ten years standing. They shall hold their offices for life, subject to a power of removal by Her Majesty, for misbehaviour or incapacity, on a joint address presented by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord

Chief Justice of England: Provided, that until Parliament shall otherwise direct, the judges to be appointed under this Act shall not be more than seven in number.

Whenever the office of any such judge shall become vacant, a new judge qualified in like manner may be appointed thereto by Her Majesty.

7. The judges appointed under this Act shall rank next after the junior judge for the time being of the High Court of Justice; and among themselves according to the priority of their respective appointments.

8. There shall be paid as a salary to every judge appointed under this Act, to include all travelling allowances, the sum of £3000 a year; and such salaries shall be charged on the same fund, and be paid to the persons respectively entitled thereto, in the same manner as the salaries of the County Court judges are now charged and paid.

9. Her Majesty may, on a petition presented through the Lord Chancellor for that purpose, grant to any judge appointed under this Act, who has served for twenty years in a judicial office, or for fifteen years as judge of a principal County Court, or who is disabled by permanent infirmity from the performance of the duties of his office, a pension, by way of annuity for the term of his life, not exceeding two-thirds of the yearly salary to which such judge is entitled: Provided, that if any such judge shall resign his office before he shall have received or become entitled to receive the salary payable to him under this Act for the full period of five years, any pension payable to him upon such retirement under this Act shall be calculated with reference to the average amount of salary received or receivable by him for the five years next preceding the date of such retirement, and not with reference to the salary to which he shall be entitled at the time of presenting his petition to Her Majesty for the grant of a pension.

10. There shall be attached to every principal County Court one or more officers, to be called judicial registrars. They shall be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Any registrar of County Courts, or barrister or solicitor of not less than five years standing shall be qualified to be a judicial registrar; but the first appointments shall, so far as circumstances permit, be made from the existing registrars of the County Courts comprised in Schedule A. hereto annexed. The number of the judicial registrars, and the tenure of their offices, shall be determined, with the sanction of the Treasury, by the Lord Chancellor, who may, with like sanction, increase or diminish their number as circumstances may require; but so as not to deprive any judicial registrar of any right or claim to a pension which he might otherwise have under the provisions of this Act.

The judicial registrars shall reside within the circuits of the principal County Courts to which they are respectively attached. Any judicial registrar may be removed from one principal County Court to another when and as the Lord Chancellor shall think fit.

No judicial registrar shall practise, directly or indirectly, as a barrister, special pleader, equity draughtsman, conveyancer, solicitor, proctor, or notary public.

11. The judicial registrars shall be remunerated by salaries. They shall not be entitled to receive fees for their own use under any Act of Parliament authorising registrars of County Courts or local courts of bankruptcy to take fees for their own use. There shall be paid as a salary to every judicial registrar, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, the sum of £1200 a year; and such further sum as the Treasury shall in each case deem reasonable to defray the expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties.

Every judicial registrar shall be deemed to be employed in the permanent civil service of Her Majesty, and shall be entitled as such to a pension in the same manner and upon the same terms and conditions as the other permanent civil servants of Her Majesty are entitled to pensions.

Nothing herein contained shall affect the right of any judicial registrar to receive for his own use fees as a district registrar, if appointed a district registrar of the High Court of Justice.

12. From and after the passing of this Act, vacancies in the office of registrar of any of the County Courts comprised in Schedule A. hereto annexed shall not be filled up. On the occurrence of any such vacancy, all the duties of registrar of the vacated County Court, including the superintendence of the office of such court, and the staff of clerks therein, shall be discharged by such one or more of the judicial registrars for the time being acting in the principal County Court circuit within which such court is situate, as the Lord Chancellor with the advice of the judges of such courts respectively, may from time to time determine.

Provision for the execution of the duties of high bailiff at the principal County Courts, and in the respective circuits thereof, shall from time to time be made by the Lord Chancellor, with the advice aforesaid and with the sanction of the Treasury. No judicial registrar shall be competent to execute the office of high bailiff.

13. Until the change for which provision is hereby made shall be completely effected, the existing registrars and other officers holding offices in the several County Courts comprised within the principal County Court circuits constituted under the provisions of this Act, shall be respectively attached to the principal County Courts of such circuits. Subject to the provisions of this Act, they shall continue to discharge their existing duties, and shall hold their offices by the same tenure, and receive the same salaries as heretofore: Provided, that the Lord Chancellor may by order from time to time determine the duties to be performed by the registrars of the principal County Courts in the offices thereof, and in chambers respectively, and distribute the business therein in such manner as he may think expedient.

14. Subject to the provisions and limitations hereinafter mentioned, and to the rules and orders to be made in pursuance of this Act, all actions and proceedings arising in any principal County Court circuit which can be brought in the High Court of Justice may be brought in the principal County Court of such circuit; and every such court shall have jurisdiction and authority to hear and determine the same, whatever be the nature or amount of the claim.

Every principal County Court shall be a local court of bankruptcy, and its jurisdiction as such shall be exercisable as well at the places at which by or by virtue of this Act principal County Courts are directed to be holden, as in every subsidiary County Court within the respective circuits thereof.

Every judge of a principal County Court shall, within the circuit thereof, and by direction of the Lord Chancellor, or by consent of a judge thereof, in any other principal County Court circuit have and exercise, in addition to his ordinary powers as a County Court judge and judge of a local Court of Bankruptcy, all the powers and jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court of Justice.

15. Provided, that any party to any action or proceeding brought in a principal County Court, which cannot, under the provisions of this Act, be heard and determined by a judicial registrar, may apply at any time, or any reasonable grounds, to the High Court of Justice or to a judge thereof, for leave to remove such action or proceeding into the High Court of Justice; and if upon cases shown such court or judge is of opinion that the action or proceeding is a proper one to be removed, or that for some special reason it ought to be heard and disposed of in the High Court of Justice, such court or judge may order its removal accordingly, upon such terms as to security for costs or otherwise, as such court or judge shall think just; and may, by any such order, direct at what stage in the action or proceeding the proceedings in the High Court of Justice shall commence.

16. Any party to any action or proceeding brought in the High Court of Justice may apply at any time, on any reasonable grounds, to the court or to a judge thereof for leave to remove such action into a principal County Court; and if such court or judge is of opinion that the action or proceeding can be properly and conveniently disposed of in a principal County Court, such court or judge may order its removal accordingly; or may order that it be retained in the High Court of Justice upon such terms as to security for costs or otherwise as such court or judge shall think just; and may, in such last-mentioned case, direct that any interlocutory proceeding or issue in or arising out of such action be sent for trial to a principal County Court.

17. From and after the commencement of this Act, if any action or proceeding is brought in the High Court of Justice in which a claim capable of being valued in money is made, and which might, under the provisions of the Acts relating to the County Courts, have been brought in a County Court, and if in such action or proceeding the plaintiff shall not recover, obtain, or establish any damages, relief, right, or claim exceeding £50 in amount of value, the costs allowed him shall not exceed the cost to which he would have been entitled if such action or proceeding had been brought in a County Court, unless the High Court of Justice, or a judge thereof, shall otherwise order.

18. No principal County Court or judge thereof shall have jurisdiction to hear any action brought on a judgment of a Superior Court or judge; or any prize cause, or any proceeding within the Naval Prize Act 1864, or within any Act for the suppression of the slave trade, or any divorce or matrimonial cause.

19. Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the rules and orders to be made in pursuance of this Act, the jurisdiction conferred on the judges of County Courts by the County Courts Act 1846, and the several Acts altering and amending the same, or by any Act of Parliament relating to the said courts and judges, may be exercised in open court within the principal County Court circuits in which they may respectively for the time being be acting, by the judicial registrars; and the said Acts shall be construed, and shall take effect and apply, so far as relates to anything done or to be done after the commencement of this Act, and so far as the same may be respectively applicable, to the judicial registrars appointed under this Act, as if they had been originally named therein: Provided, that such jurisdiction shall not be exercised by a judicial registrar, without the consent of all parties to be affected thereby, in any action in which the claim exceeds £20, or in which a set off, or demand by way of counterclaim exceeding £20, is set up; or in any action or proceeding in which any relief other than or in addition to the payment of a money demand is claimed by any party thereto, or in respect of which jurisdiction is given to the County Courts by the several Acts mentioned in Schedule B. [twenty in number] hereto annexed, except in such proceedings under any of the said Acts as may now be disposed of by a registrar of a County Court, or are ministerial only and not judicial.

The jurisdiction authorised by the Bankruptcy Act 1869, to be exercised by the registrars of County Courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy by delegation from the judge of any local bankruptcy court may be exercised in like manner, as well at the places at which by or by virtue of this Act principal County Courts are directed to be holden, as in every subsidiary County Court within the respective circuits thereof, by the judicial registrars; who may also, in open court within the principal County Court circuits in which they may respectively for the time being be acting, inquire into, ascertain, and certify to the judge of the principal County Court the means which any judgment debtor has or has had since the date of the judgment or order of satisfying the judgment debt; and every such certificate, unless the defendant gives notice four days at least before the hearing of the summons for commitment to the registrar of the principal County Court at which such summons is to be heard, and to the plaintiff, that he disputes some material statement therein shall be conclusive evidence of the matters therein certified, and the judge may make such order thereon as he shall think just.

The judicial registrars shall have jurisdiction to adjudicate upon and certify in chambers, or at any subsidiary County Court, all such interlocutory or other applications and matters arising in the course of any action or proceeding within the principal County Court circuit in which they may respectively for the time being be acting, as might, if the action or proceeding were pending in the High Court of Justice, be adjudicated upon or certified in chambers by a master, registrar, chief clerk, or other officer of the High Court; or, as may be adjudicated upon by the registrar of a County Court, subject nevertheless to the direction and review of the judge.

20. The judges appointed under this Act shall, within the principal County Court circuits in which they may respectively for the time being be acting, sit and hold courts at the places at which by or by virtue of this Act sittings of principal County Courts are directed to be holden, under such regulations, and at such intervals as may from time to time in each case be determined by the Lord Chancellor; but so that no such judge appointed under this Act shall be obliged to sit or hold courts between the fifteenth day of August and the fifteenth day of October.

Every judge of a principal County Court may hear and determine any action or proceeding, either at a principal County Court, or at any subsidiary court or other place within the principal County Court circuit in which he may for the time being be acting, and which he may specially appoint for the purpose.

Every judge of a principal County Court may sit in chambers, and when in chambers shall, in respect of all proceedings pending within the principal County Court circuit in which he may for the time being be acting, have and exercise the same powers and jurisdiction as might be had and exercised in chambers by a judge of the High Court of Justice in respect of proceedings pending in that court.

21. The judicial registrars shall, within the principal County Court circuits in which they may respectively for the time being be acting, hold courts at each place where the County Court is holden at the respective times or intervals, and in the same manner as the said courts have hitherto been holden by the County Court judges. They shall, when not engaged in travelling and holding courts within their respective circuits, attend at the principal County Courts to which they are respectively attached, and there assist the judges, and otherwise perform such duties as may be prescribed, or may be assigned to them by order of any such judge.

Provided, that no judicial registrar shall be required to hold courts or perform his prescribed duties in person during the month of September, or such other equivalent period in every year, as the Lord Chancellor shall from time to time in any case direct.

22. Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the rules and orders to be made in pursuance of this Act, all actions and proceedings arising within any principal County Court circuit, and all motions and applications to the court in its capacity of a local court of bankruptcy or otherwise, which are not within the limits of the jurisdiction by this Act conferred on judicial registrars, or which the parties or the judicial registrar may think of sufficient importance to be heard by a judge, whether within the limits of the jurisdiction of the judicial registrar, or not, shall be heard and determined by a judge, either at a principal County Court or at such other place within the circuit as the court shall for any special reason appoint for the purpose; but all interlocutory proceedings, so far as conveniently may be, shall be disposed of in the County Court in which they originally commenced.

Any solicitor of the Supreme Court may appear and be heard in any principal County Court, without being required to employ counsel; but motions by the Bar, and cases in which counsel are engaged shall have precedence of those in which solicitors appear.

23. Any person dissatisfied with the judgment, ruling, or order of any judge of a principal County Court in any action or proceeding in which an appeal is allowed under the Acts relating to the County Courts, not being a proceeding in bankruptcy, may appeal, either by way of special case or by motion, upon such terms as to security for costs or otherwise, and in such manner as may be prescribed, to the High Court of Justice, and from that court to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal.

Every judgment, ruling, or order, not being an order in bankruptcy, made by a judicial registrar may, upon the application of any person dissatisfied therewith, and upon such terms as to security for costs or otherwise as may be prescribed, be reheard by a judge of the principal County Court to which such judicial registrar is attached.

24. From and after the commencement of this Act, the judges of County Courts, other than the judges appointed under this Act, shall rank next after the judges appointed under this Act, according to the priority of their respective appointments; and the salaries now payable to such judges shall be increased by £300 a year; Provided, that no such judge shall receive a larger salary than £1800 a year.

25. For the purpose of enabling the provisions of this Act to be carried into effect without delay, it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor to offer to any judges of County Courts, not exceeding six in number, who shall be willing to retire, pensions by way of annuity to be continued during their respective lives, equal to the full salary to which judges of County Courts are entitled, and the Treasury is hereby authorised to pay the same accordingly: Provided, that no such pension shall exceed the sum of £1500 a year.

26. If, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act, and in order to make way for the formation of the new circuits, the Lord Chancellor shall deem it necessary to exercise the power vested in him of removing any judge of County Courts from the districts of which he is the judge, and in or in the neighbourhood of which he resides, and of appointing him to any other district or districts, it shall be lawful for the Treasury to allow and pay to every judge so removed, by way of compensation for the expenses attendant on his removal, such sum as shall in each case be considered just and reasonable; but this section shall not apply to any judge of County Courts appointed under the provisions of this Act to any principal County Court.

27. The judges of the principal County Courts, or any three or more of them whom the Lord Chancellor may appoint for the purpose, shall, so soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this Act, under the direction of the Lord Chancellor, frame such rules, orders, and forms for regulating the practice and procedure of the principal County Courts, and such scales of costs to be paid to counsel and solicitors in respect of proceedings under this Act, as may in their opinion be necessary for giving full effect to the provisions of this Act; and such rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs, certified under the hands of the said judges, and allowed by the Lord Chancellor, shall from and after the commencement of this Act be in force in every principal County Court, and be judicially noticed. The said judges, or any three or more of them so appointed as aforesaid, may from time to time, under the like direction, revise, or vary, or revoke any such rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs. They may, for the purpose of framing or revising such rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs, adapt any rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs for the time being in use in the High Court of Justice. Any rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs so certified and allowed shall be deemed to be within the powers conferred by this Act, and shall have the same force as if they were enacted in the body of this Act.

Except so far as otherwise expressly directed by such rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs, the practice and procedure and the allowances of costs in the principal County Courts shall be regulated by the rules, orders, forms, and scales of costs for the time being in force for regulating the practice and procedure of the County Courts.

Nothing in this Act shall authorise any alteration of the general rules made in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

28. The County Courts Act 1846, and the several Acts altering and amending the same, shall, so far as the same may be respectively applicable, be construed, together with this Act, as one Act; and this Act may be cited as the County Courts Act, 1877.

29. This Act shall come into operation on the second day of November next after the passing thereof, except as to sects. 6, 12, and 27, as to which sections it shall come into operation immediately on the passing thereof.

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

IN our last issue we published (page 204) a letter, signed "Lex," upon the subject of passing from one branch of the Profession to the other. The following is the clause referred to therein, and which, we understand, forms part of the Legal Practitioners' Society's Bill of the present session:—"The stamp duty payable upon articles of clerkship, whereby any person who shall have been previously duly admitted to the degree of barrister-at-law in England first becomes bound to serve as clerk in order to his admission as a solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England, shall be £30, and no stamp duty shall be payable upon the admission of such person as a solicitor of the said Supreme Court of Judicature, and no stamp duty shall be payable on the admission to be a member of either of the four Inns of Court in England, or on the admission to the degree of barrister-at-law in England of any person who shall have been previously duly admitted as an attorney of Her Majesty's late superior courts of law at Westminster, or as a solicitor of the late High Court of Chancery in England, or as a solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England." A reference to our correspondent's letter shows that there is excellent authority for such an enactment as the above, in the fact that during recent years like provision has been made in the case of Irish barristers and Scotch advocates seeking to be called to the English Bar. It is worthy, too, of comment that while solicitors contribute £105 to the public exchequer, besides certificate duty, before they can practise, barristers only contribute £75. If this clause passes it will strengthen the hands of the chief law society in regard to modifying the rules of the Inns of Court.

MR. WILLIAM GORDON, M.P. (solicitor), the newly elected President of the Legal Practitioners' Society, introduced, on Friday, the 9th inst., the Legal Practitioners' Bill 1877, and the bill was, on the same day, read a first time. The name of Mr. W. T. Charley, M.P., also appears on the back of the bill. Mr. Bigger, M.P., has given notice of the rejection of the measure. The bill at present stands for second reading on the 13th of June next.

SOME months ago we announced that the Common Law Taxing Masters were in the habit of allowing the sittings fee of 15s. after appearance in an action upon taxation of party and party costs, and that rule has, we understand, generally obtained, until lately, when some, at all events, of the masters have only allowed this fee after statement of claim, or notice in lieu thereof has been delivered, or on an order to stay, or on a taxation under Order XIV., rule 1. Looking at the altered procedure, and the several steps that can be taken in an action in the absence of all pleadings, we feel strongly that the original plan should be adhered to of allowing the equivalent for the old term fee after appearance in all cases.

A GOOD deal has been said of late about solicitors sharing auctioneers' commissions with them, and the Council of the Incorporated Law Society has very properly denied the truth of the wholesale accusations of the kind that have been made against the solicitors. The representative body of the auctioneers also protested that the charge, so far as they were concerned, was untrue. We have received a copy of a circular letter, dated 14th Feb. 1877, and marked "Confidential," and addressed by an auctioneer to solicitors. It is in these terms: "I beg to offer you my services for any sales by auction, valuations, or other business for which you need an auctioneer or estate agent. My connection is such as to ensure a satisfactory sale for property of every kind, and my knowledge and experience of the various branches of the business enable me to carry through efficiently all matters connected with it. I have a large auction room here for the disposal of furniture, stocks in trade, &c., when a sale is not desired upon the vendor's premises. My terms are the lowest that can be quoted consistent with proper attention, and I am willing to allow you a share of commission as follows: On net commissions not exceeding £10, one-third allowance; exceeding £10 and not exceeding £25, one-half allowance; exceeding £25, three-fifths allowance. I must beg you to understand that these allowances will not in any way prejudice your client's interests, as I do not charge a penny more in any case on account of having to share the profit. I simply rely on the increased number of commissions to recoup me for their reduced amount. I shall be happy to wait upon you at any time, or instructions by post will be promptly attended to." The author of this tempting bait seems to have the subject of the late discussion in his mind when writing the latter part of this letter. We hope the auctioneers' society will deal with this circular, which, strange to say, makes no mention of the rate of commission charged by the applicant.

THERE are probably few solicitors who are not acquainted with sect. 37 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, which provides that solicitors are not to commence an action for fees till one month after delivery of their bills. In this section provision is also made for referring bills to a master for taxation, whether relating to business transacted in court or not; for taxation after a month has elapsed; for taxation after twelve months under special circumstances; for payment of costs of taxation; for an order of the court upon a solicitor to deliver his bill, and to deliver up deeds, &c.; for procuring evidence of delivery of bill of costs, and power is given to a judge to authorise action to be brought by the solicitor for his debt before the expiration of the month from date of delivery. And for a period of over thirty years solicitors have been content to labour under the disabilities contained in this section. Early in 1875 the Legal Practitioners' Society took action with a view to the removal of at least one of such disabilities, and the consequence was the passing of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 79, which repeals sect. 37 of the Act of 1843, from the words "provided also that it shall be lawful for any judge of the Superior Courts of law and equity," to the end of the section, and power is given in sect. 2 of the new Act for a judge to allow an action for costs, &c., to be brought in certain cases, although the statutory month has not expired. Our main purpose in calling attention to this enactment is to urge that the time has come when solicitors ought to insist upon the repeal of all enactments which place them, as regards their debtors, in a worse position than other ordinary creditors. Lately a case was reported in which a solicitor was sued by a person who owed the solicitor a much larger sum than he claimed against the solicitor, and yet, because the debt due to the solicitor was for a bill of costs not delivered when action brought against him, he was precluded from pleading the amount of his bill as a set off. Can anything be more unfair? The repeal of section 37 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, so far as it affects the rights of solicitors to sue for costs, is certainly necessary, and we cannot understand why it is allowed to remain on the statute book. We observe that the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, in its last annual report, simply says that Mr. Gregory, M.P., was requested "to give the Bill his general support in Parliament." It is a pity Mr. Gregory did not move with a view to the repeal of so much of the section as is affected by the new enactment.

In reference to a letter signed "A Non Prizeman" in our last issue upon the subject of some effort being made to secure for solicitors a record of their several qualifications and distinctions, such as that furnished as regards barristers by the Law List, and also by the Inns of Court Calendar (published by Butterworths), we have received from the editor of The Solicitor's Diary, Law List, and Calendar (published by Waterlows), a notification to the effect that this very object has been attempted in the issue of the Diary for the present year, and that he hopes, with the assistance of solicitors, to be able, in a few years, to record in this Diary the several distinctions and special qualifications possessed by solicitors of the Supreme Court. We may add that we consider the plan an excellent one, but it can only be accomplished by the hearty co-operation of the solicitors throughout the country. There are, we know, a large number of solicitors who have distinguished themselves as well at the law examinations as at the universities, and these are matters which especially deserve to be chronicled in the Solicitors' Calendar. No doubt the official Law List is very one-sided in this respect, that while much general information is given as regards barristers, nothing of the kind is given as regards solicitors, such general information being considered (as our correspondent informed us) "inadmissible."

In another column we publish several queries as to the construction of Order III., rule 6, Order XIV., rule 1, Order XXI., rule 4, and Order XXXVI., rule 1. London practitioners would have little difficulty in answering our correspondents' enquiries, while in some of the district registries it is, we dare say, not so easy to ascertain the practice which obtains in the principal registry. We must, however, be permitted to say that some of our country correspondents' inquiries on points of practice are such as any tyro should be familiar with.

In consequence of numerous communications received, we publish the following form for use by county law societies when petitioning Parliament against Lord Redesdale's proposals in regard to Parliamentary Agency. This form has been used by the Incorporated Law Society, and we believe by other societies of solicitors:—

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED: The humble petition of the Law Society sheweth.—1. That your petitioners, as representing the practising solicitors of the United Kingdom, have considered the report of the joint select committee of the House of Lords and the House of Commons on parliamentary agency. 2. That in the opinion of your petitioners, the Profession of a parliamentary agent is essentially of a legal character, and requires an accurate acquaintance, not only with particular branches of law, but with the general principles and practice of the law, besides an acquaintance with the practice of Parliament and a sound knowledge of parliamentary drafting. 3. That the duties of a parliamentary agent are no more distinct from those of a barrister and solicitor than those of a barrister devoting himself to common law business are distinguished from those of a barrister devoting himself to chancery business, or than those of a solicitor confining himself principally to conveyancing and chancery business are distinct from those of a solicitor practising chiefly in bankruptcy and criminal law. 4. That in each of the above cases the barrister and solicitor is required to pass an examination in general law before he is allowed to devote himself to any one branch of the Profession. 5. That parliamentary agents should, in like manner, be required to pass the examination to which a barrister or solicitor is subject; and in that case, in order to test his proficiency in parliamentary practice, questions can be proposed at the examinations for admission to the Bar or to the roll of solicitors in that branch, as is now the case in all other branches of law. 6. That if all parliamentary agents in future are barristers or solicitors, there can be no difficulty in a candidate becoming a pupil or an articled clerk to a parliamentary practitioner for all or part of his educational period, in the same way as a pupil now studies, or is articled, with a barrister or solicitor practising in the particular branch to which he wishes eventually to devote himself. 7. That the Council of Legal Education and the Council of the Incorporated Law Society would always be able to provide qualified examiners in parliamentary law in every other branch of practice. 8. That a general examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, followed by a special examination in parliamentary practice only, would not be calculated to ensure so general a knowledge of law as is necessary for a parliamentary agent, although it is quite possible that there may be exceptional cases of first-rate ability without any test whatever. 9. That the proposed restriction to barristers and solicitors of the right to practice cannot be considered in any way as a monopoly, since it is open to anyone to enter one or other of these professions, and it is not proposed to interfere with any Parliamentary agents at present practising, nor to adopt a different rule with regard to Scotland. 10. That solicitors are subject to heavy taxes on articles of clerkship, admission, and practice, and it is not reasonable that practitioners in Parliament should be exempt from similar charges. 11. That it is undesirable to create an entirely new profession for the purpose of engaging in a particular branch of legal business, and the Legislature has acted in that way by opening to the whole Profession the peculiar and technical duties formerly performed by proctors, a step which has proved most advantageous to the public. 12. That although, if there be special restrictions whereby the number of Parliamentary agents may become very limited, it may reasonably be presumed that such limited number would probably be better acquainted with the practice, and give less trouble to the officers of the Houses of Parliament than a larger number of practitioners, yet it would be no more for the benefit of the public to create such a monopoly than to limit the number of practitioners in the other branches of the law. 13. That the tendency of practice is to concentrate itself, to a great extent, in the hands of those known to be most efficient in each particular branch; but many good reasons prevail to render the employment of more general practitioners advantageous in numerous cases, and this latter course should not be restricted by exceptional legislation tending to confine the business to a favoured few. 14. That in the report of a Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1835, the committee expressed an opinion that evil instead of good will accrue to the community if anything approaching to a monopoly or restriction to a number of agents should be produced under the recommendation they had offered. 15. That although a scale of maximum charges may reasonably be imposed on Parliamentary agents, it is contrary to good policy, the principle of freedom of contract, and the interests of the public, to interfere with private arrangements as to agency or diminished charges, so long as such charges are not shared by unqualified practitioners. 16. That the practice of dividing charges between the country solicitor and the London agent has prevailed without objection for many centuries in Chancery, common law, bankruptcy, and in appeals to the House of Lords and Privy Council, and of late in probate and divorce business, and that there is no distinction between these cases and that of a Parliamentary agent, the country solicitor being as dependent on his London agent in points of practice in common law, Chancery, and Probate cases as the solicitor is on his agent in Parliamentary cases. 17. That inasmuch as special rules for regulating the admission and practice of Parliamentary agents may very materially affect the large body of barristers and solicitors, they should be afforded a reasonable opportunity of considering and submitting their views upon any such proposed rules, and that this is in accordance with the precedent of 1835, when considerable time elapsed between the presentation of the report and its adoption. Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Right Honourable House that in any regulations that may be made with regard to proceedings on any petition or Bill, a provision be inserted to the effect that, with the exception of existing Parliamentary agents, none but barristers, solicitors, and writers to the signet shall be qualified to act as Parliamentary agents; that no prohibition be inserted in any such regulations against the division of professional charges between the Parliamentary agent and any qualified practitioner; that before any such regulations be confirmed by your Right Honourable House your petitioners may have an opportunity of being heard thereon. And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

This petition embodies the whole of the arguments in favour of the status quo. It may perhaps be well to point out more clearly than in the above form the evil effects upon the legal work of the country occasioned by the monopoly of the Bar, and, further, that many country solicitors are even in the habit of undertaking Parliamentary work without employing any agent at all. We may add that the debates in both Houses of Parliament last July on the subject of Lord Redesdale's motion will be found fully reported in the LAW TIMES of 5th August last.

ELSEWHERE we publish a short report of an application to the Common Pleas Division for an order calling on a solicitor to pay over money to a client or to answer the matter in an affidavit. We are much afraid that this process is being at times resorted to in order to enforce payment of money which in any other case than that of a solicitor would be sued for in a court of law. Tradesmen often adopt criminal proceedings against customers to enforce payment for goods supplied, and the courts are all ready to condemn this practice. In the application to which we refer, the provisions of sects. 7, 8, 9, 10 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 68, were entirely overlooked. It must not be forgotten that by these sections the Registrar of Solicitors may appear on the application, and his costs may be ordered to be paid by the party applying against the solicitor. If, therefore, a solicitor can satisfy the council that the application is an unfair one, the council are in a position to appear and defend the solicitor.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

Inquiries, as to Students' Debating Societies, as to the several Examinations, and as to Admission on the Roll of the Supreme Court, as to being called to the Bar, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, should be addressed to the Editor (Students' Department).

In our last issue (page 258) we published a note of the case Ex parte Adams (an article clerk), which will be found reported in 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 751, Ch. D. We have so many applications upon points in connection with service under articles, the answers to which will in many cases be found in a careful consideration of the judgment of the High Court in this case, that we call special attention to it. The decision is especially useful as showing in what way, and under what circumstances, an assignment of articles of clerkship will be considered as satisfying the requirements of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 3. On the other hand, without questioning the judgment in the case, we are convinced that a modification of the requirements of the Act is much needed, and the facts of this case especially point to such a want.

UPON the subject of our announcement that notices for the final examination, and notices for admission on the roll of solicitors can be renewed within one week from the end of the month for which such original notices have respectively been given, a correspondent writes: "In April last year I gave notice for the June examination, but, wishing to be examined in November, at the end of June I went to the Law Society's Buildings in Chancery-lane, to renew my notices. I was asked if my articles had expired, and on answering that they had not I was informed that the regulation above quoted only applied to cases in which 'articles had expired,' and therefore I could not renew my notice, but must give a fresh one, and must also have a new set of questions answered by the solicitor to whom I was articulated." We are glad to have this information, but the construction thus put upon the provision in the third schedule to the general rules and regulations of November 1875 is clearly incorrect.

THE following lectures and classes are appointed to be delivered and held in the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, during the ensuing week: Monday, Equity Class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock p.m.; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, ditto; Thursday, lecture on Conveyancing, 6 to 7 o'clock p.m. Subscribers are not admitted to the hall after lectures have commenced.

WHERE articles expire between the 9th April and 22nd May, candidates may be examined on the 24th and 25th April next; and if between the 21st May and 2nd Nov., may be examined on the 19th and 20th June next; or, of course, at any subsequent examination. Six weeks' notice at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of the month of examination.

In case of the death of a principal during articles, fresh articles should always be entered into without loss of time. The time which elapses between the day of the death of the principal and the day of the date of fresh articles being entered into, does not count, so that the further articles must be for a time sufficient to make up for this loss of service, as well as for the unexpired term of the original articles of clerkship.

THE days appointed in 1877 for the Preliminary Examinations are Wednesday 21st and Thursday 22nd February; Wednesday 16th and Thursday 17th May; Wednesday 11th and Thursday 12th July; Wednesday 24th and Thursday 25th October.

THE general rules and regulations as to the several examinations prior to admission on the roll of solicitors, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, issued on the 2nd Nov. 1875, provide in effect "that if any solicitor of the Supreme Court, after having at any time taken out a stamped certificate, shall, for the space of a whole year from and after the expiration thereof, have neglected to renew the same for the following year, or has failed to obtain such a certificate within twelve months from the date of his admission on the Roll, the registrar shall not afterwards grant a certificate to such solicitor, except under an order of the Master of the Rolls, and for the purpose of obtaining such an order the applicant shall, six weeks before the application is intended to be made, give notice thereof as in the case of an original admission, and the affidavits in support of such application shall be filed at the Petty Bag Office, and a copy thereof shall at the same time be left with the clerk of the Petty Bag, to be delivered by him to the Registrar of Solicitors, and the order for such taking out or renewal, shall (if made) be drawn up on reading such affidavits, and an affidavit of such copies having been left and notices given. Upon an application to dispense with the required notice of intention to take out or renew a certificate, a summons must be served on the Registrar of Solicitors calling on him to shew cause within ten days why such taking out or renewal of certificate should not be allowed; and if no cause be shown to the satisfaction of the Master of the Rolls, he may make an order for allowing such certificate to be issued."

EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR STUDENTSHIPS, HONOURS, AND PASS CERTIFICATES.

The attention of students is requested to the following rules:—

As an encouragement to students to study Jurisprudence and Roman Civil Law, twelve studentships of one hundred guineas each shall be established, and divided equally into two classes; the first class of studentships to continue for two years, and to be open for competition to any student as to whom not more than four terms shall have elapsed since he kept his first term; and the second class to continue for one year only, and to be open for competition to any student, not then already entitled to a studentship, as to whom not less than four and not more than eight terms shall have elapsed since he kept his first term; two of each class of such studentships to be awarded by the council, on the recommendation of the committee, after every examination before Hilary and Trinity Terms respectively, to the two students of each set of competitors who shall have passed the best examination in both Jurisprudence and Roman Civil Law. But the committee shall not be obliged to recommend any studentship to be awarded if the result of the examination be such as in their opinion not to justify such recommendation.

No student admitted after the 31st Dec. 1872, shall receive from the council the certificate of fitness for call to the Bar required by the four Inns of Court unless he shall have passed a satisfactory examination in the following subjects, viz., first, Roman Civil Law; secondly, the Law of Real and Personal Property; thirdly, Common Law; and, fourthly, Equity.

The examination will commence on Friday, the 11th May next, and be continued on the Saturday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday following. #### BIRMINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

On the occasion of the thirtieth annual meeting in connection with the Birmingham Law Students' Society, the members dined together at the Midland Hotel. The chair was occupied by Mr. W. Foreyth, Q.C., M.P., and the vice-chair by Mr. S. Balden. There were also present Messrs. W. H. B. Roher, T. E. Spencer, H. Parish, F. W. Lowe, R. Duke, T. H. Gem, R. Free, B. Weekes, W. Johnson, Crowther Davies, J. E. Deakin, E. B. Rawlings, Jacob Rowlands, J. B. Hebbert, S. C. Hadley, Redgrave, Caddick, Canning, S. R. Shore (secretary), H. Goodman (treasurer), W. J. Sutton (librarian), &c.

In proposing the first toast, "The Queen and the Royal Family," the Chairman remarked that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to intimate her intention of opening Parliament next session in person, and he trusted that they might take that as an omen of the Queen's intention to show herself more frequently among her subjects. (Hear, hear.) He was quite sure that whenever she appeared amongst them she would be received with loyalty and heartiness. As the interests of her Majesty were inseparably interwoven with those of the rest of the Royal family, he should not seek to disavow them. (Hear, hear.)

The toast was drunk with enthusiasm.

Mr. Roher proposed "The Houses of Parliament;" and the Chairman, in responding, said he had no connection with the peerage—the Prime Minister had not confided to him his intention of drawing him to the House where he had himself gone—and he felt somewhat at a loss to return thanks for that august assembly, the House of Lords. He thought he might, however, as a citizen of a free country, say that there never was a time when there was less antagonism between the House of Lords and the country, or when the country at large had more confidence in the House of Lords. (Applause.) There was a feature in connection with the House of Commons which he believed would ensure it a prolonged existence—it never set itself in foolish obstinacy against the strongly-expressed and determined will of the people. The House of Commons was an institution which grew with our strength, and as England became older, it seemed to be fonder of its House of Commons. Next week the new session of Parliament would commence, and he expected it would be a more lively session than we had had for some years. The ironclads of the Opposition were getting up their steam and preparing for action. He thought all—whether friends or foe—would charitably wish the Ministry a good deliverance. (Hear, hear.) Perhaps the present was the only occasion when a member of Parliament would address a meeting of his fellow-countrymen and not in the course of his speech allude to the Eastern Question. They knew that the Conference had done nothing, but he hoped the result would not be war—certainly not war in which England would be or could be engaged—but that a peaceful solution would be given which would secure to the unhappy provinces of Turkey something like good government, and spare Europe the calamity of a war. (Hear.) But besides the question of foreign politics, there were many questions of interest of a domestic nature to occupy their attention. He thought he might say with truth that seldom had there been a Parliament which had devoted itself more earnestly and more sedulously to the social condition and well-being of the people than the present Parliament, which began in the year 1874, and in that he took no more credit to his own party than the other, because, although they might differ as to the means and quarrel as to the different modes of carrying on the work, Conservatives and Liberals had one object in view—to promote the welfare and increase the happiness and prosperity of the people of this great empire. (Applause.)

The Secretary then announced the receipt of letters of apology for non-attendance from Mr. Motterham, Q.C. (judge), Mr. Loxdale Warren, Mr. A. Young, Mr. Jesse Herbert, Mr. A. Ryland, Mr. Saunders, Mr. G. J. Johnson, Mr. J. Horton, Mr. T. Martineau, and Mr. W. H. Tyndall.

The Secretary afterwards read the committee's annual report, which stated that never since its foundation—thirty years ago—had the society stood so high as at the present time. It appeared from the annual report of the United Law Students' Society, London, that the Birmingham Law Students' Society, was now by far the largest in the United Kingdom, besides being one of the oldest. During the past year twenty new ordinary members and seven honorary members had been elected, four out of the twenty-seven being graduates, and five students having passed into the rank of solicitors. The society now consisted of 201 hon. members and 67 ordinary, being a considerable increase on last year. Of ordinary meetings—of which there had been 600 exactly—nineteen were held last year for the purpose of discussing legal or jurisprudential moot points. The attendance at those meetings had varied from twelve to thirty-eight, with an average of twenty-one members per meeting. The debates on the whole had been very well sustained. The report contained details as to lectures delivered, and went on to state that the great event of the past year had undoubtedly been the transfer of the society's library to the commodious new premises of the Birmingham Law Society. The committee hoped that the next session would demonstrate the members' appreciation of the advantages they enjoyed. Many new books suitable for students had been added to the library, "and many other books also very suitable for students have been abstracted. The return of these will oblige." (Laughter.) In conclusion, the committee urged upon the members the necessity of regular attendance at the debates and lectures, and upon all solicitors the vital importance of their articulated clerks becoming members.

The treasurer's report stated that the society had paid all its debts and had a balance in hand of £9 16s. 2d., whereas at the commencement of the year it was in debt to the amount of £30 9s. The receipts for the past year amounted to £120—a much larger sum than had ever been collected in any previous year.

Upon the motion of Mr. Lowe, the reports were adopted.

Auditors, scrutineers, and committee having been appointed,

The Chairman delivered an address, in the course of which he said he thought it was impossible to exaggerate the utility of such an institution as the Law Students' Society. The danger in respect of the kind of education which a solicitor would receive was that of falling into habits of routine and mere technicality. He could not conceive anything better suited to make a man a sound and accurate lawyer than the habit of discussing, as it were in open court, questions of law. No man could do that successfully without examining principles, sifting authorities, and making himself master, to a certain extent, of the science of law. The English law had been accused—as compared with the scientific system of other countries—of being barbarous, and as not deserving the name science. That was by no means true. They would find that the common law of England—if they studied it properly—could be generally solved into a certain number of great principles, which commended themselves to their reason as just and right, and it was in that sense, and that sense alone, that the law deserved a high encomium passed upon it. He did not think they ought to confine themselves solely to the study of the law. There was such a thing as literature, which might be cultivated not only with advantage to themselves but with success to others, because they might enlarge, strengthen, and refine their minds by making literature the hand-maid to law. (Hear, hear.) A good deal had been said lately about the advisability of amalgamating the two professions of a barrister and a solicitor. He was not at all surprised that the outside public should see no reason why the two professions should be distinct. The real reason—which to his mind was conclusive—why there ought to be a separation between the two professions was, that they never would have worked properly done unless there was a subdivision of labour. He did not believe that the public would save in point of money by the change. Certainly, if he undertook to do for his client both kinds of work—that of a solicitor and that of a barrister—he should charge for both just the same. (Laughter.) A more honourable profession than that of a solicitor could not well be conceived. A good man and a sound lawyer would always gain the respect and esteem of his fellow-men, and earn the rich reward through life of an approving conscience. No doubt the profession of the law had been open to reproach, and justly so, for it opened the door to a great deal of chicanery and something very often like fraud. The great characteristic of the law of late years had been its becoming less and less technical, and more and more leading to substantial justice. It was no doubt with reference to that tendency that the High Court of Justice was established, but he thought its establishment had been changes by no means desirable, and he saw no reason why the time-honoured names of English jurisprudence should have been swept away. There was no doubt that the High Court of Judicature was suffering from a pressure of business; and it was disgraceful that in a country like England, with all its wealth, its commercial intelligence, and its vast commercial interests, the judges at the present moment could not find a room in which to sit, but were obliged to ask almost piteously for a parlour or a closet where they might hold a court and transact the business of the country. He also thought that it was a melancholy thing to see ten of the Judges of England taken from the courts—where there were most important cases pending and waiting for judgment—to the Privy Council, for the purpose of determining whether a clergyman should stand east or north, or wear a black or a white gown, as if the whole interest of the Church of England depended upon the result. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Forsyth proceeded to refer to Mr. Norwood's bill, the object of which was to enable a client who retained counsel to bring an action against him if he neglected his business. If it had been pressed to a division he should have opposed the bill, but only on one ground. He felt strongly that Mr. Norwood had a good case of complaint, and he should have supported the bill if he had thought there was no other remedy, for he held that it was in the highest degree disgraceful for any man to receive payment for work which he could not perform. Still the people had the matter in their own hands to reform. Speaking of legal education, he said he did not see why there should be anything like a legal university in London to which students should be required to go. In conclusion, he urged the students to take such a course as should end, not only in their being successful lawyers, but kind and good men. He proposed "The Birmingham Law Students' Society."

Mr. S. C. Hadley, in responding, alluded to the fact that the rolls of the society had contained the names of a large number of eminent lawyers now practising in Birmingham and its vicinity, many of whom had acknowledged their indebtedness to the society for its assistance. Amongst others he might mention the learned Ex-president of the Birmingham Law Society, Mr. G. J. Johnson, who, in a recent lecture on Satisfied Terms, said he owed his acquaintance with the subject to a debate in which he took part when a student of the society.

The remaining toasts were "The Bench and the Bar," proposed by the Vice-Chairman, and responded to by Mr. Roher; "The Birmingham Law Society," proposed by Mr. Deakin, and acknowledged by Mr. Johnson; "The Officers of the Birmingham Law Students' Society," proposed by Mr. Weekes and responded to by Mr. Shore.

The proceedings terminated with a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman.

BRISTOL LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held in the Law Library, Small-street, Bristol, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 6. The chair was taken by L. A. Good-eve, Esq., barrister-at-law. The subject for discussion was, "That the doctrine of satisfaction is not beneficial." The affirmative was opened by Mr. Powell, seconded by Mr. Cross; the negative was opened by Mr. Millard, seconded by Mr. Carpenter. Other members having spoken on the question, the president summed up the arguments, and the motion, on being put to the meeting, was lost by a majority of two votes. A hearty vote of thanks to the president terminated the meeting.

HULL LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AN ordinary meeting of this society was held on the 6th inst. The point for discussion was the following: "Can an action be brought on a verbal contract for the sale of fixtures?" Messrs. Winter, Hobson, and Martinson argued in the affirmative, and Mr. Bell in the negative. The point was decided in the affirmative. Another meeting was held on the 13th inst., and a discussion took place on the subject: "Should the law of primogeniture be abolished?" Mr. Farrell spoke for the affirmative, and was supported by Messrs. Gordan and Lambert; the negative was taken by Messrs. Winter and Martinson. The question, on being put to the vote, was carried in the affirmative.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

AT the meeting of this society, held at the Law Institution on Tuesday, the 6th inst., Mr. Gibb in the chair, the question discussed was as follows: "A testator bequeaths a leasehold house to trustees for the residue of the term of eighty years for the benefit of A. He also makes a residuary bequest of all realty and personally. The term being about to expire in the testator's lifetime, he takes an extension of the lease for 100 years, and dies without having altered his will. Does A. take any interest under the will?" (See 1 Vict. c. 26, sect. 23, 24, Re Gibson, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 669; Cox v. Bennett, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 422.) Mr. Eady opened the debate in the affirmative, and, after considerable discussion, it was decided in that way by a majority of one vote. The secretary announced that at the recent L.L.B. examination of the University of London for honours, Mr. Archibald Arthur Frankerd, B.A., a member of this society, was awarded the exhibition in the first class. Thirty-two members were present at the meeting.

At the meeting on Tuesday last, the 13th inst., at the Law Institution (Mr. Eady, L.L.B., in the chair), a very interesting discussion took place on the subject of the taking of commissions by solicitors. Mr. Inderman (in the absence of Mr. E. C. Harris) opened the debate, stating that he believed the taking of commissions did exist to a considerable extent, and on behalf of those solicitors who had taken commissions, not considering there was any harm in so doing, he defended the practice, and argued that as the majority of solicitors considered there was no objection to taking commissions from brokers or insurance offices, so by analogy the taking of commissions from auctioneers was a justifiable course, and that it was not fair to stigmatise such a practice as it recently had been stigmatised both by the Incorporated Law Society and the Birmingham Law Society as wholly unprofessional and unjustifiable. Mr. Dabee opened the subject in a negative view, submitting that the taking of commissions from auctioneers opened a door of temptation to solicitors to employ always a certain auctioneer to the possible prejudice of the client, but he did not seem to consider that there was much (if any) objection to the taking of commissions from brokers or insurance offices. A good discussion ensued, when the majority of the members present were decidedly in favour of Mr. Dupree's view of the matter, and some members were even found to go so far as to argue that the taking of commissions in any shape by solicitors is an improper course. Two new members were present.

LEEDS LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held on Monday the 12th inst. Mr. Serjt. H. T. Atkinson occupied the chair. The subject under discussion was, "Can a husband, by showing that he has forbidden his wife to pledge his credit, although no notice of that fact has been communicated to the tradesman, limit his liability for her contracts for necessities?" The following cases, amongst many others, were cited: Manby v. Scott (2 S. L. C. 386), Etherington v. Parrot (1 Salk, 118), Philpison v. Hayten (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 38), Montague v. Benedict (S. C. 1 C. & P. 356), Reneaux v. Teacle (13 C. B. 627), Jolly v. Rees (C. B. 15 N. S. p. 628), Howard v. Sheward (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 148). There was a large attendance, though only eighteen members voted on the subject. The affirmative was carried by a majority of eight votes. A hearty vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

NOTTINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

THE third ordinary meeting of this society was held at the Grand Jury Room, Guildhall, Nottingham, on Friday evening, the 2nd Feb. The chair was taken by John Hodgson, Esq., solicitor. The question for discussion was, "That the Permissive Bill is worthy of support." The affirmative was opened by Mr. Joseph Bright, supported by Mr. W. H. Kay; and the negative by Mr. S. G. Warner. All the members present took part in the debate, and the question was decided in the affirmative by five votes to three. The meeting was attended by fourteen members.

PLYMOUTH, STONEHOUSE, AND DEVONPORT LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at the Athenæum, Plymouth, on Friday, the 9th inst. (E. G. Bennett, Esq., in the chair). The business of the evening commenced with the election of Mr. F. E. Bennett as an ordinary member, this election making a total of ten ordinary members who have joined the society during the present session. The secretary stated that the draft of the new rules had remained on the table at the Law Library for upwards of a month without having been altered, and asked the opinion of the meeting as to their being printed; after a discussion on the subject, it was decided that the printing be proceeded with immediately. The subject for debate, "Can an agreement, the signature to which was procured by a threat of detention of a person's goods, or of injury to them, be repudiated by a party so coerced?" was then brought forward by Mr. Scall, Mr. Chubb being in the negative. Messrs. Harrison, Helpman, Fox, Gary, and Matthews also spoke on the subject. On the question being put to the vote, it was decided in the negative. At the next meeting of this society an imaginary action at Nisi Prius will be tried, the plaintiff claiming damages from a railway company for injuries received in a collision.

SOLICITORS' APPRENTICES' LEGAL DEBATING SOCIETY (DUBLIN).

A MEETING of the above society was held at their room, No. 6, Townsend-street, last Saturday, when the following subject was debated: "That the execution of Charles I. was justifiable."

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

At a meeting held on Wednesday, the 7th inst., a motion in favour of holding meetings for the discussion of legal subjects on the second and fourth Monday in each month, at the Law Institution, was carried unanimously. A report of the committee on the proposed establishment of a law library in connection with this society was laid on the table, and formed the basis of a full and lengthy discussion. The management is to be entrusted to a librarian, members being allowed to retain books for a fortnight, reports, pamphlets, and other papers for a week, subject to a further extension of time at the discretion of the librarian. In consequence of the length of time occupied, the debate stands adjourned sine die.

At the meeting held on Wednesday, the 14th inst., at Clement's-inn Hall, Strand, the following formed the subject of discussion: "That the grand jury system should be abolished." Mr. E. C. Rawlings opened the debate, and in a lengthy and exhaustive speech, set out the various arguments against the present system. After a full discussion, in which a number of members took part, the motion was carried by a majority of sixteen. Previously to the debate, Mr. F. B. Moyle was unanimously appointed librarian. The debate appointed for Wednesday next is, "That trading on Sunday should be allowed."

PROFESSIONAL SECRECY.—The Court of Cassation at Brussels has given an important decision relative to the privileges of priests in what is called "professional secrecy." The Abbé Wantelet had received from a member of his congregation the confidential declaration that he was about to fight a duel. The priest gave information to the police, who took the proper steps to prevent the meeting; but the Abbé, on being called to give evidence before the examining magistrate, declined to do so on the ground of his sacred functions. He was fined 50fr., and, he having appealed against that judgment, the court has now confirmed the sentence, ruling that all citizens are bound to enlighten justice, and that the priest cannot claim the benefit of Art. 458 of the Penal Code of 1862, unless he has received the communication in confession; outside of that limit he cannot claim "professional secrecy."

ARE COLPORTEURS "HAWKERS"?—Mr. H. N. Bransby, on behalf of the local branch of the Colporteurs' Association, asked the opinion of the Magistrates at the Petty Sessions last week, as to the liability of colporteurs to take out licences for hawking books. Mr. Bransby said that though, according to the letter of the law, they were so liable, yet, in the metropolis, the exemption in the Act of publishers' agents was extended to colporteurs. The district book hawker was called, and confirmed Mr. Bransby's statement that he gained nothing whatever from the sale of books. He was paid a fixed salary. The Chairman said that the Bench were of opinion that, according to the letter and intention of the Act, a colporteur must take out a hawker's licence, but they would be willing to grant a case for a superior court. Mr. Bransby said that the Society he represented did not require this.

BARBISTERS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—Sir John Karslake, Q.C., presided on Tuesday at the annual meeting of this Association, held in the hall of the Middle Temple. The warmth of the reception accorded to the chairman was unusually marked. Mr. Macroby read the report. During the past year 94 members had joined the Association, and donations to the amount of £121 had been promised or paid. The total amount of donations received was £2322. The annual subscriptions amount to £852, or £169 more than in 1875. During the present year the committee had received 15 applications for relief. In 12 instances grants had been made amounting to £586. Several of the cases were of a very distressing character. The chairman moved the adoption of the report. He dwelt upon the guarantees which that Association, founded four years ago, afforded that the relief should be given with discrimination and delicacy. The widowed ladies and others whom it assisted submitted their applications to professional men well acquainted with the circumstances. There had been 83 applications since the foundation of the Society, and 50 had been granted; but the Association was not yet so well supported as it expected to be, considering the wealth of the profession. He congratulated Mr. Lanyon, the secretary of the Association for what he had been accustomed to call the Home Circuit, on having added 69 members to the Society during the past year. A rule of the Association had deprived the committee of the presidency of Mr. Justice Manisty, one of the earliest and most assiduous workers in its cause. They had done well in selecting Sir Henry James in his stead; and now that we had a Ministry as nearly approaching perfection as possible (as Sir H. James would agree) Sir Henry would be able to devote more time to this Association than he could when legal offices were otherwise distributed. Baron Pollock seconded the resolution. Lord Justice Amphlett proposed the nomination of a Committee of Management, which included the names of many eminent counsel. Mr. J. J. Johnson, Q.C., seconded the resolution. Sir Henry James, Q.C., M.P., proposed a vote of thanks to Sir J. Karslake for presiding. He said that the Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir Alexander Cockburn, had written to express his great regret that he was prevented by illness from supporting the chairman. The Attorney-General had requested him to say that he was detained by his official duties in Parliament, and the Solicitor-General, although Sir H. James regretted that the cause of his absence was not parliamentary duties was nevertheless called elsewhere by public work. Four years ago Sir John Karslake had proposed a resolution for the formation of that Society, and his presidency was particularly appropriate. Other chairmen had adorned their meetings with high judicial distinction, but Sir John Karslake had been, perhaps, the brightest ornament of the profession and the Bar; and, even now, when members of that Profession wished, in the name of one man, to express everything which was manly, truthful, and straightforward, they spoke of John Karslake. He would not enter into a discussion on the merits of the Government. He knew of a place where the account given of them by Sir John Karslake was not universally accepted, and where it was believed that a Government, more nearly approaching perfection than the present, existed when Her Majesty had the advantage and assistance of Sir John Karslake's services. But those who, like himself, had tasted the joys of contrast with Sir J. Karslake, and those who had not, all joined heartily in welcoming him, and thanking him for his presence. Mr. Serjeant Parry seconded the vote, and the meeting broke up.

J. HOUNSELL, Esq., Surgeon, Bridport, Dorsetshire writes:—"I consider BUSTON'S NERVINE a specific for toothache. Very severe cases under my care have found instantaneous and permanent relief. I therefore recommend its use to the Profession and the Public as invaluable to all who suffer from toothache."—[Adv.]

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BUILDING CONTRACT—LICENCE TO SEIZE ON BANKRUPTCY OF CONTRACTOR—SEIZURE AFTER FILING OF A LIQUIDATION PETITION, BUT WITHOUT NOTICE, PROTECTED.—In March 1875 A. entered into a contract with a building club to erect some houses for them upon their land. The contract provided that if A. should neglect to proceed with the work in a proper manner to the satisfaction of the architect of the club, or become bankrupt or insolvent, or otherwise be rendered incapable of completing the contract, the architect should have power, after giving two days' notice, in writing to A., to appoint other persons to complete the contract, and also to seize and retain all materials, plant, and implements upon the ground, provided that A. had received money on account of the contract. On the 30th May 1876, the architects gave A. notice under the contract of their intention, at the expiration of two days, to employ other persons to complete the works, and warned him not to remove the plant, implements, and materials. The same day A. filed a liquidation petition. On the 2nd June the architects took possession of the plant, implements, and materials. The trustee under the liquidation having claimed the property seized by the architect upon the ground that his title related back to a date anterior to the day when the seizure was made. Held, that the effect of the proviso was to give the club an equitable lien upon the property seized, and that as the lien was perfected by seizure before notice of an act of bankruptcy, the transaction was within the protection of sect. 94 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869: (Ex parte Dickin, re Waugh, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769. Bank.)

COMPOSITION BY INSTALLMENTS—DEED OF INSPECTORSHIP—CONSTRUCTION—SUBSEQUENT BANKRUPTCY—LIABILITY OF SURETY.—Where a surety has guaranteed the payment of an instalment under a composition deed, he is not released by the debtor's subsequently being adjudged a bankrupt. By resolutions duly registered, the creditors of a liquidating debtor agreed to accept a composition of 7s. 6d. in the pound, payable by three instalments, the last of such instalments to be guaranteed by G., the surety. By a subsequent deed of inspectorship the debtor was to be allowed to carry on his business; but in case he failed to pay the instalments due under the composition, the inspectors might apply for an adjudication in bankruptcy or an assignment of all his property; and further, that in the event of the said debtor being adjudicated bankrupt, or of an assignment of his property under the provisions of the deed, G. should thereupon stand released from his aforesaid guarantee. The debtor, upon the petition of a third party, was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt. Held, that such bankruptcy did not per se relieve G. of his liability as surety under the composition. Held, also, that the adjudication contemplated by the deed of inspectorship was one brought about by the inspectors, and not by a third party: (Glegg v. Gibbey, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 761. Q. B. Div.)

SITTINGS IN BANKRUPTCY.

Ex parte TURNER, re ATTWATER.

Appeal to House of Lords—"Difficult question of law."—Discretion.

F. O. Crump applied for leave to appeal in this case to the House of Lords. It is reported 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 682, and decided that sects. 94 and 95 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 do not protect a bill of sale holder whose bill of sale is unregistered, and who takes possession before his debtor files his petition, if the debtor has committed a prior though secret act of bankruptcy.

Winslow, Q.C. and Winch appeared for the trustee.

The COURT (James, L.J., and Bramwell and Bagge, J.J.A.) refused leave on the ground that the point of law involved was not one of difficulty.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Monday, Feb. 12.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Ex parte WILSON, re DEARDEN.

Letting furniture to hire—Order and disposition—Evidence of custom.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Manchester County Court upon a question of importance to furniture dealers and others. The appellant, Thomas Wilson, a cabinetmaker, carrying on business at Strangeways, Manchester, by agreement made in Oct., 1875, let to the debtor, Richard Henry Dearden, a tradesman at Manchester, a large quantity of furniture upon hire. The debtor presented a petition for liquidation on the 28th April, 1876, when a receiver was appointed, who proceeded to the debtor's residence for the purpose of taking possession of the furniture. The receiver found that a portion of the goods had been removed on the same day by the appellant, and that the rest were in course of removal. The trustee under the liquidation, upon his appointment, claimed to be entitled to the furniture, on the ground that the same was in the debtor's "order and disposition" at the date of the petition being filed. To this it was replied that there existed a custom, well known to furniture dealers, to let furniture to customers upon the hiring system, and that, therefore, the reputation of ownership did not arise, so as to entitle the trustee to the property. The learned judge in the court below said, "What he had to determine was not whether the practice of supplying customers with furniture under contracts of this description was well known to furniture dealers, but whether it was so well known that the ordinary creditors of the bankrupt were likely to know of its existence;" and he decided against the alleged custom, and ordered the furniture to be delivered to the trustee. Mr. Wilson appealed.

Woodward appeared for the appellant.

De Gez, Q.C. and Ford North for the respondent.

The CHIEF JUDGE held there was no sufficient evidence of any general custom which would prevent the operation of the order and disposition clause of the Act, and dismissed the appeal with costs.

Ex parte MILNER; re HUMPHRIDGE.

Composition—Reduction of proof—Action—Injunction.

THIS was an appeal from the County Court of Glamorganshire, held at Newport.

In 1874 the debtor filed a petition for liquidation, and the creditors resolved to accept 5s. in the pound as a composition. Milner sent in a proof for £63: this was not admitted. The sum admitted to be due was £28, and the composition was tendered on that. Milner refused to receive it. He had already commenced his action to recover the £63, and in 1876 sought to proceed with it. He was restrained by the County Court Judge, and he appealed.

F. O. Crump, for the appellant, contended that the trustee appointed to pay the composition had no right to reject or reduce the proof, but should have obtained an inquiry in the Court of Bankruptcy (Ex parte Boking; re Bostel, L. Rep. 19 Eq. 261.) The tender of the composition on £28 was not a tender on the creditor's debt, therefore his right revived. The other creditors had all been paid before the end of 1874, therefore this was a question only between the debtor and the particular creditor. In Ex parte Watson, re Watson (L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 63), Mellish, L.J., said, "It has been laid down in previous cases that, where the objection to the composition is one which applies only as between the debtor and the particular creditor who is bringing the action, the action ought not to be restrained." He referred also to Edwards v. Coombe, Ex parte Hodge; re Hutton, and Paper Staining Company v. Bishop.

Rosburgh, Q.C. and Doria, who appeared for the debtor, were not called on.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that the action ought to be restrained. The matter should be completely outworked in the Court of Bankruptcy under sect. 72, and the Court of Bankruptcy was the proper tribunal in which to settle the question between the parties.

Rosburgh applied for costs, but they were refused on the ground that the trustee might have obtained an inquiry in 1874, and precluded the possibility of an action.

NEWCASTLE COUNTY COURT.

Jan. 25 and Feb. 9.

(Before T. BRADSHAW, Esq., Judge.)

KIRKUP v. GREENER.

Sale of goods by sample—Implied warranty on sale by sample—Malting barley—Distinction between words of commendation and words of warranty.

Garbutt for the plaintiff.

Sewell for the defendant.

HIS HONOUR.—In this case the plaintiff, who is a commission agent, agreed to purchase, on the 28th Oct. last, in Newcastle market, by sample, a parcel of malting barley, then lying in the barn of the defendant, who is a farmer at Ryton, at 36s. a quarter. The defendant did not then know the exact quantity, but it turned out to be 184 bolls. The price was £82 10s. The plaintiff purchased that quantity, and after the purchase re-sold the entire parcel in one lot, by sample, as malting barley, to Messrs. Allison, brewers, of Sunderland, at 37s. 6d., being an advance of 1s. 6d. a quarter on the price. On the 7th Nov. plaintiff paid for the barley. Defendant, after the sale of the barley, put it into sacks, and in these sacks it remained until the 24th Nov., when, by plaintiff's direction, it was forwarded to Sunderland, where it arrived in due course on the 28th Nov. Up to this point there is no dispute as to the facts. Shortly after the arrival of the barley at Messrs. Allison's, they came to the conclusion, upon examining the bulk, that it was not equal to the sample, that it was dirty, and sprouting to a considerable extent, and that it was not malting barley, that is, barley fit for malting at all. Accordingly, they refused to take it, and gave notice to that effect to the plaintiff. The plaintiff communicated that to the defendant, and it was arranged between the plaintiff and the defendant that they should go together to Sunderland and see the barley. They went a few days afterwards. Messrs. Allison: James Smith, their managing clerk, and Lealie, their maltster, were all there. Then a difference of opinion arose between Messrs. Allison and their servants and the defendant, the former alleging in substance that it was not according to sample, and that it was not malting barley at all; the defendant, on the other hand, asserting that it was quite as good as the sample, and would malt well. The result was that Messrs. Allison adhered to their refusal to take the barley, and rescinded their contract with the plaintiff. It is admitted that the plaintiff then requested the defendant to take it back, but he said he would have nothing to do with it. The plaintiff thereupon sold the barley out against the defendant. It realised £82 12s. net, and the plaintiff seeks to recover £19 18s., the difference between what he received on the resale and the £82 10s. he originally paid. It was resolved by a cornfactor at Sunderland, who gave evidence that it was not malting barley, that it was not according to sample, and that he got a fair market price for it. On the plaintiff's case being closed, Mr. Sewell, for the defendants, claimed a nonsuit on various grounds, and especially upon the ground that there is no implied warranty in law that the bulk shall be equal to the sample—the only implied warranty on sale by sample being that the sample was fairly taken, and he cited Addison on Contracts, 495, and Soyers v. London and Birmingham Flint Glass Company (37 L. J. 294, Ex.) I allowed Mr. Garbutt to amend his particulars so as to raise the real question at issue between the parties, and desired Mr. Sewell to call his witnesses so that I might get the facts. Mr. Garbutt for the plaintiff replied. I reserved my judgment to look into the authorities. It seems to be beyond all question that in the simple case of goods sold by sample, if the quality of the goods does not correspond with the sample, the remedy is to be sought in the power to rescind the contract on that ground. In such a case, Lord Chelmsford, says: "It is the duty of the purchaser to make a distinct offer to return, or in fact to return the goods, by stating to the vendor that the goods are at his risk, that they no longer belong to the purchaser, that the purchaser rejects them, that he throws them back on the vendor's hands, and that the contract is rescinded." Conston v. Chapman (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Scotch App. 256). And Brett, J., in Grimoldby v. Wells (L. Rep. 10 C. P. 395), "The true proposition is, that if the purchaser on inspection finds the goods not equal to sample he has a right to reject them then and there, and is not bound to do more than reject them." He adds, putting a judicial construction on the passage cited above from Lord Chelmsford's judgment, that the Lord Chancellor's "language is to be construed not as cumulative, but as alternative." It, therefore, the transaction had been simply a sale of barley by sample, I agree with Mr. Sewell that the plaintiff must have submitted to a nonsuit; and for this reason that a person must unequivocally reject and dispossess himself of the goods which he seeks to reject as not being in accordance with the sample. To use the words of Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Grimoldby v. Wells (supra), "He must do nothing after he discovers that they are not in accordance with the contract in the nature of an exercise of dominion over the goods, or inconsistent with the property in them being in the vendor." But this was not, in my opinion, now that we have the entire question raised on the amended particulars, a sale of barley by simple simpliciter. It was a sale by sample of "malting barley." Mr. Sewell urged upon me that the word malting is an adjective of commendation only, and words of commendation do not amount to a warranty. The expressing "superior wine" and "superior old port," and other expressions of that nature, have undoubtedly been held to be mere words of commendation, and not of warranty. This, however, seems rather to belong to the class of cases of which Smith v. Hughes (6 L. Rep. Q. B. 597) is a recent example. There the question was of "old oats." The case did not turn upon the precise point before me:

but I refer to it because it was assumed throughout the judgments of Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn and Hannen, J.J., that the word old was of the essence of the contract, and not a word of commendation. Here I am of opinion that the word "malting" is of the essence of the contract, and that in a sale of malting barley, where the purchaser buys by sample without an opportunity of inspecting the bulk, there is an implied warranty, not only that the sample shall be fairly taken, but also that the barley shall be suitable for the purposes of malting. Malting barley is, in fact, barley of a particular description, and intended for a particular purpose, perfectly well known to them who frequent the market and deal in such commodities, and perfectly well understood by both parties to this contract. The result of the authorities seems to be that if one sells goods by sample there is no other implied warranty than that the sample is fairly taken, and the purchaser's remedy, if the quality of the goods should not turn out to be equal to the sample, lies in his right to reject them. It is sufficient for this purpose if he give the seller notice that he rejects them, and that the goods are at the seller's risk; he is not bound to return them to the seller, or to offer to do so, or to place them in neutral custody. But if one sells by sample goods of a particular description as "old oats," "malting barley," where the adjective is of the essence of the contract, the purchaser having no opportunity of inspecting the bulk, the goods must not only when delivered correspond with the sample, but there is an implied warranty that they shall be saleable or merchantable under that description. In such a case the purchaser has a double remedy. He may either rescind the contract by giving notice to the seller that he rejects the goods, and that they are at the seller's risk; or he may, after giving the seller notice of rejection and getting his refusal to take back the goods, sell out against him, and sue him for any deficiency in the price on the resale. Here the weight of evidence leads me to find as a fact, that, although the sample was a fair sample of malting barley, the bulk was not equal to it. It was not malting barley at all. It was not, in fact, saleable, or in any way suitable for the purpose for which the seller knew it was intended. If this be so, there was a breach of the implied warranty that the barley was suitable for malting, and upon that the purchaser was entitled to sell out against the seller, he having refused to take back the goods, and to bring an action for the recovery of the difference between what he received on the resale, and what he paid. As the matter is of general interest, and of considerable importance to persons who are in the habit of buying by sample in the market, I give the defendant leave to take the opinion of the court above on a special case, to be approved of by me. My judgment is for the plaintiff, for £19 18s., the amount claimed.

NOTTINGHAM COUNTY COURT.

Thursday, Jan. 18.

(Before R. WILDMAN, Esq., Judge.)

T. H. TAYLOR (trading as Taylor Bros.) v. MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers Act—Machine-made lace—Damage in transitu—Protection of carrier.

THE plaintiffs claimed £48 0s. 2d., the value of a parcel of lace delivered to the defendants at Nottingham, on the 5th Oct. 1876, consigned to London, and which became damaged and spoilt in transit. The lace was machine made and was made entirely of silk.

Hind, of the firm of Wells and Hind, of Nottingham, said the defendants claimed protection under the Carriers Act (1 Will. 4, c. 68). He contended that they were not protected, as machine-made lace was expressly exempted from the operation of that Act by the subsequent amending Act of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 94. He argued that the latter Act included all descriptions of machine-made lace, whatever the material of which it was made. He stated that the question in the case was one of great importance to the manufacturers of Nottingham, and of equal importance to the railway company, and whatever judgment his Honour might give it would be appealed against.

J. P. Young, of Birmingham, for the defendants, referred to the wording of the first section of the Carriers Act, which stated that common carriers should not be liable for the loss of or injury to certain specified goods, including "silk in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, and whether wrought up or not wrought up with other materials," and also "lace." He also referred to the case of Hart v. Bazendale (6 Exch. 769), Brunt v. Midland Railway Company (33 L. J. 187, Ex.), Butt v. Great Western Railway Company (20 L. J. 241, C. P.), Bernstein v. Bazendale (38 L. J. 265, C. P.), and Flowers v. Eastern Railway Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 329), and argued therefrom that whatever the action might be when manufactured or wrought up if made from silk, the company were protected. It followed that before the passing of the amending Act the defendants would in a case like the present have been protected on the ground that the goods were silk wrought up, and also on the ground that the goods were lace. The Act of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 94, directed that the term "lace" in the Carriers Act "shall be construed as not including machine-made lace;" and he contended that the effect of the amending Act was merely to take away one ground of defence only. The amending Act did not state that machine-made lace of any description whatever was included, if such had been intended it would have been easy to have made the intention clear.

HIS HONOUR.—The question to be considered in this case is whether machine-made silk lace is still within the provisions of the Act for the protection of carriers, or is taken out of it by the amending Act, which excepts machine-made lace. There can be no doubt that but for the amending Act machine-made silk lace would be protected both as lace and as silk, but it is contended that the words of the amending Act include lace of any material whatsoever, so that if silk, or silver thread, or gold thread, be manufactured into lace by machinery it is not protected. If such was the intention of the Legislature it would have been easy to have expressed it by adding after the words "lace" the words "of any material whatsoever." In effect the construction contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs requires the Act to be read as if it contained these words. But since the Act only specifies lace, I am of opinion that silk in all its forms is still protected, and, consequently, machine-made silk lace, though not protected in respect of its denomination as lace, is protected in respect of its quality as silk. Otherwise this absurdity would follow, that carriers would be protected in respect of silk in the form of pieces, but not in the form of machine-made silk lace, which is capable of the greatest value in the smallest compass. For these reasons judgment must be entered for the defendants.

SUNDERLAND COUNTY COURT.

Friday, Jan. 19.

(Before E. J. MEYNELL, Esq., Judge.)

BROWN v. DODDS.

Allowances to solicitors—Sect. 91 of the County Courts Act 1846 unrepealed by statute of 1875—Scale of costs of Nov. 1875, ultra vires, and not to be followed.

IN this case damages of less amount than £5 had been recovered, and plaintiff's costs had been taxed and allowed by the registrar pursuant to the scale under sect. 8 of the County Courts Act 1875.

Robson, W. W. (solicitor), moved to review the taxation.

Holmes (solicitor) contra.

Robson submitted that the provision made for costs of attorneys by the County Courts Act of 1846 still subsisted, and regulated the present allowances, notwithstanding subsequent legislation. Under sect. 91 of that statute attorneys were not entitled to costs unless the debt or damage claimed should exceed 40s.; nor to more than 10s. unless such debt or damage exceeded £5; nor to more than 15s. in any case under the summary jurisdiction given by the Act, which provisions were absolutely binding on attorney and client. With regard to costs between party and party, the fees of an attorney were not allowable against the opposite party, where, in case of a plaintiff, less than £5 were recovered, nor where, in case of a defendant, less than £5 were claimed, or, in any case, unless by order of the judge. It was afterwards held that an attorney was not prevented from recovering fees, in the subject matter of the cause preliminary to the action. Now the question arose, whether sect. 91 of the County Courts Act of 1846 had been repealed by the statute of 1875, under which the scale of costs to which he objected as inoperative, had been framed? He contended that no express repeal of the section had been made. The Act of 1875 expressly repealed part of sect. 62 of the original Act, and it might be said that by implication sect. 8 of the late Act repealed sect. 91 of the former one, by empowering a scale of legal costs to be framed by judges and allowed by the Lord Chancellor, but the doctrine of "implied repeal" was not to be favoured. He admitted that sect. 3 was in the widest terms, but recollected that, even in Lord Mansfield's time, it was laid down that "general" expressions were to be taken secundum subjectum materiam. Sect. 8 of the Act of 1875 meant that a scale might be framed in all cases where the costs had not been already fixed by law; thus the scale might legally provide for costs chargeable by the solicitor to the client for matters preliminary to suit, a construction which made the statutes consistent with each other. The fundamental principle of County Courts legislation—easy and cheap recovery of small debts—could not be got rid of and reversed by five of the judges of that court, and the approval of the Lord Chancellor. He contended that in no case under £20 could more than 15s. for solicitor's fees be recovered from the opposite party, and that solicitor's fees could not be legally indorsed on the summons in anticipation of their subsequent allowance by the judge. The allowances by the new scale were distributive; some of its items were chargeable between solicitor and client, and some—only those sanctioned by the Act of 1846—were chargeable between party and party.

Holmes supported the registrar's allocatur.

HIS HONOUR was not surprised at the point raised by Mr. Robson. The first appearance of the new scale raised a doubt in his mind whether it could override the express enactments of the Legislature. Other judges entertained similar doubts, but one of them at once held that the scale was wholly ultra vires, so far as it professed, or intended, to get rid of sect. 91 of the Act of 1846. It had been amended before a year old, and, in that being done, the mistake had been repeated. The judges had provided in the scale for fees to counsel in cases where less than £5 was recovered; they had also made the professional costs depend upon what the plaintiff chose to demand, and not upon what he recovered. His Honour had no hesitation in holding that the new scale, so far as it purported to apply to costs between party and party, in actions under £20, was wholly ultra vires, and could not be judicially followed. He ordered the taxation to be reviewed, and the solicitor's costs to be disallowed.

NOTE.—This Department of the Law Times being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editors do not hold themselves responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

EXECUTIVE PROMPTNESS.—We think the following case of prompt executive ability should be brought under the notice of the Profession. At half past two yesterday we were consulted by a debtor, into whose house an execution for a sum over £50 was put, with orders for immediate sale. The debtor being anxious that his effects should be equally distributed among his creditors, we took him over to Ulverston, where Mr. Registrar Postlethwaite, having heard the facts of the case, consented to file the man's petition in liquidation, and proceeded, on the requisite evidence, to appoint a receiver, and restrain the execution creditors, which we were able to effect by service of the order upon the sheriff at half past five. Of the three hours between our receiving instructions, and restraining the sheriff, one hour and a quarter was spent on the road. I think your readers will agree with me that if all public functionaries and particularly all legal functionaries, were as prompt in attending to their executive duties as the learned registrar, it would be a good thing for solicitors, and a better thing for clients. We enclose the name and address of our firm but for obvious reasons, not for publication.

WARE v. CORPE.—I have read with care the article in your journal of the 3rd Feb. (p. 237) on the judgment of the learned judge of the Westminster County Court, in the case of Ware v. Corpe. I have not been able to meet with a report of that case, and therefore take the facts as stated by your correspondent to be correctly stated; and assuming that to be so, I venture to differ with your correspondent as to the soundness of the learned judge's decision; regretting, in connection with your correspondent, that the case will not (as appears by his statement) go up to an appeal. The cases to which your correspondent refers, all appear to me to proceed on the principle that a nuisance, to be the subject of an action, must be an interference with the ordinary and reasonable comfort of the plaintiff, or such an interference as to injure his property. Crump v. Lambert, Walker v. Selfe, Ball v. Ray (referred to by your correspondent), and many other cases, all rest on the principle that to justify an action for an injury there must be, not a mere annoyance to the particular taste or feelings of the complainant, but a substantial injury to his reasonable rights or comfort. Now, what are the facts as I collect them from your correspondent's statement. The plaintiff, according to his own evidence, shows that the organ complained of was played about two or three times a week only, and that it was usually played from seven to ten in the evening. There is no allegation that it was played in the usual hours of professional or intellectual labour, viz., from nine or ten in the morning till six in the evening. And the other evidence on the part of the plaintiff went no further. In the case of Hull v. Ray (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 167) Lord Selborne, L.C., pointed out this distinction—"that although the ordinary noises which may accompany the ordinary use of a house for its ordinary purposes, are not in point of law a nuisance; yet, where the occupant of a house uses it for an unusual purpose, and thereby causes substantial injury to his neighbour, that constitutes nuisance." Now, it is a matter of general knowledge, that as to London houses, occupied by cultivated persons, at least five houses out of ten have pianos, very frequently played in the evening, and very frequently an annoyance to the next door neighbours; and it is difficult to see the distinction between that use of a house with thin partition walls, and a similar use of a private chamber in a house occupied by several tenants. If in the case of Ware v. Corpe the organ playing had been in the daytime (say from nine to six) or for two or three hours in the middle or business period of the day, it is probable that the court would have granted an injunction restraining that particular use of the organ; for it would have fallen within Ball v. Ray, because it would have been used for a purpose most unusual in a house occupied by business men. But the use of an organ or other instrument in the evening, after the customary hours of business are over, is not for an unusual purpose, but on the contrary, for a very usual one, on the above grounds and the authorities. I submit that the judgment of the learned County Court Judge is consistent with the authorities, and with a common sense view of the circumstances of this particular case.

Queries.

96. COUNTY COURTS.—Where, in the case of a default summons under the County Courts Act, 1875, sect. 1, the judge expresses his opinion that the particulars annexed to the summons are not sufficient, has he power to try the case on the merits, and then to mulct the plaintiff's solicitor, who issued the summons, in respect of the fees for entering plaint, &c., and attending the court on the hearing? I cannot find anything in the County Courts Acts or Order which would give him this privilege.

D. S.

97. VENDORS AND PURCHASERS ACT, 1874, SECT. 4.—A mortgagee of freehold estate dies intestate. His personal representative applies for discharge of the mortgage debt, and this the mortgagor proposes to do by way of transfer. Can the mortgagee's personal representative transfer the legal estate to the transferee under the above sect., that is, does such sect. apply to a transfer of mortgage or only to a re-conveyance on payment off by mortgagor, or an absolute extinction of the mortgage debt by sale of the mortgaged property? I shall be obliged if you, or some of your readers, will give an opinion on the point.

98. ORDER III., RULE 6; 14, RULE 1; 21, RULE 4; 36, RULE 1.—If some of your experienced readers, would be good enough to answer the following queries, on simple points of practice, I should feel much obliged. (1) In a case where the writ of summons is specially endorsed under Order III., rule 6, and the defendant has, in his appearance, dispensed with a statement of claim, and the plaintiff does not avail himself of Order XIV., rule 1, by calling upon the defendant to disclose his defence to the action, when can the plaintiff sign judgment. It is optional with the defendant to deliver a defence, and if none be delivered, judgment cannot of course, be signed for want of it. If the plaintiff were to deliver a statement of claim, the defendant would then be bound to deliver a defence, otherwise judgment, but the cost of the statement of claim would probably be disallowed on taxation. Is the plaintiff obliged to go to trial, without pleadings, or what is the best course to pursue in order to obtain a judgment. (2) Where a defendant has not dispensed with a statement of claim, and the notice mentioned in Order XXI., rule 4, is delivered, and the plaintiff does not proceed under Order XIV., can the plaintiff sign judgment if no defence be delivered? (3) Is it the practice to add to the above notice the claim of the plaintiff, and to mention the place of trial, as in the case of an ordinary statement of claim. Such an addition, it would seem, would render unnecessary any subsequent application for an order fixing the place at which it might be desired to have the action tried. By Order XXXVI., rule 1, "where no place of trial is named in the statement of claim, the place of trial, shall, unless a judge otherwise orders, be the county of Middlesex." True.

(1) If plaintiff does not proceed under Order XIV., rule 1, he must give notice of trial, and proceed without pleadings. (2) Yes. (3) See the form of notice in schedule to rules. Of course place of trial should be stated, otherwise Order XXXVI., rule 1, applies.—ED. SOL. DERR.]

99. SUMMONS UNDER 11 & 12 VICT., C. 43, GRANTED ON A SUNDAY.—In a recent case before a bench of county magistrates, a summons under the above statute was objected to on the grounds that it and the information were granted and signed on a Sunday, on which day the summons bore date; this was admitted by the magistrate signing the summons; the objection was however overruled. 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43, sect. 4, provides that a warrant may be granted on a Sunday, and this would imply that without special legislation, a summons cannot be. Is not this the correct view, and Sunday being a dies non, should not the summons have been treated as though it had never been granted?

100. CROSSED CHEQUES—ENDORSEMENT.—May I ask if the following summary of the past and present law of crossed cheques is correct? I am unable to arrive at a very satisfactory settlement of the matter in my own mind. Formerly the effect of crossing a cheque either with the name of a banker, or the words "and Co.," was to make that cheque payable only to a banker, so that it was supposed not to be negotiable, and the person to whom such crossed cheque was given must have paid it into the bank, and not to any other person. Now, however, the case of Smith v. Union Bank of London seems to have taken away this supposed security; so that if a cheque be crossed simply with the name of a banker, or the words "and Co.," this crossing has no effect on the cheque, and it still remains negotiable. To remedy this the Act 39 & 40 Vict., cap. 81, provides that where it is intended that a cheque shall not be negotiable, it is necessary to add to the crossing the words "not negotiable," and then it can only be paid to a banker, and cannot be passed on from one party to another, and any person who takes a cheque crossed with the words "not negotiable" takes it at his peril, and he will have no better title than the person from whom he took it. In short, under the new Act, a cheque crossed with the additional words "not negotiable," will really now give the same security as a cheque formerly crossed with simply the words "and Co.," was supposed to give.

101. CONVEYANCING.—A wrote to B. as follows, "I will sell you the plot of land at H. for £500. If you agree to give this, write me and I will instruct my solicitor to prepare formal agreement." B. wrote in reply "I agree to give you £500 for the land at H." A's solicitor subsequently sent agreement to B., who refused to sign same on the ground that the letters formed a binding open contract. Was B's contention correct? I am under the impression that a case bearing on this point has been reported in the Law Times. If so I should be obliged by a reference thereto.

103. ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY A MARRIED WOMAN.—Will any of your readers favour me with their opinion as to whether lrs. 4d. or 2d. is the proper fee payable to a commissioner for taking the acknowledgment by one married woman of a deed and counterpart? Reg. Gen. Trin. T. 1874.

Answers.

(Q. 93.) DOWER.—With reference to the answer of your correspondent "C. H. S.," I would mention that in a chancery suit in which I was engaged, it was assumed as a matter of course on the authority of Spyer v. Hyatt, (20 Beavan 621), that the widow's right to dower had priority over mere creditors of her deceased husband, notwithstanding the acts of Parliament to which your correspondent refers, and a sum of money was by arrangement awarded to her in lieu of such right.

Geo. NICHOLS MARCY.

—If, as I apprehend in this case, the lands themselves are not subject or liable to any debt or charge, then, I think, the purchaser's view is correct, and that a good title cannot be made, unless the widow consents for the purpose of releasing her dower. Sir John Romilly held, in the case of Spyer v. Hyatt (20 Beavan, 621), that, notwithstanding, the statutes 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 104, s. 1, and 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 105, s. 5, the widow's right to dower had priority over mere creditors of a deceased husband. Should further information be required than that afforded by reading the above case, I think it will be found in Shelford's Real Property Statutes, 7th edit., pp. 440 and 487, and Tudor's Leading Cases in Conveyancing, 2nd edit., p. 65.

A. P.

(Q. 90.) VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT.—I think your contention is correct, and that the married woman can, by virtue of the Act, convey as a feme sole.

X. X.

(Q. 91.) WILL.—The devise of all trust and mortgaged estates vested in testator to B. passed the legal estate in such estates to B. A. has no estate in him to convey, and therefore, the Vendor and Purchaser Act does not apply. B. only can convey the legal estate.

(Q. 94.) NEW RULES OF COURT.—The additional new rules of the Supreme Court which have been made since Dec. 1875, are those of February, June, and December, 1876.

HENRY MORTON.

(Q. 21.) STAMP.—How does the adjudication by the commissioners accord with the following proviso in the Stamp Act of 1790, s. 78: "Provided that a conveyance or transfer, made for effectuating the appointment of a new trustee, is not to be charged with any higher duty than 10s.?"

T. C.

Application.

(Q. 1.) STAMP.—Referring to the answer given to this query in the Law Times of Feb. 10, 1877, I shall be obliged by the correspondent informing me whether the case in which the two 10s. stamps were adjudged necessary on an appointment of new trustees, and a conveyance of the trust estate by one deed, was a reported one. Would the two stamps be required if the appointment could, in conformity with the power, have been made by a writing under the hands of the parties, but was done by the same deed as the conveyance in order only to have one document.

MR. WILLIAM MERRICK, of 6, Old Jewry, E.C., Putney-hill, S.W., and Bradford-on-Avon, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor a Commissioner to Administer Oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature in England.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

THIS society met on Monday evening at its rooms in the Adelphi, and the important question of "a public prosecutor" was fully discussed. Mr. H. W. West, Q.C., Recorder of Manchester, occupied the chair, and the question was introduced by a paper by Mr. R. Denny Urrin (barrister), who described in detail the Irish system of Crown prosecutions, with which he had become acquainted during his recent official employment as examiner in the courts in Dublin. The Irish system may be briefly described thus: In every county there is a Crown solicitor, who instructs certain counsel to prosecute, all being nominated by the Attorney-General for this particular duty. The reader of the paper pointed out the mischiefs arising from the very uncertain haphazard mode of conducting prosecutions in England, where now and then the Treasury takes up the case, but where ordinarily there is a kind of private action at law brought by the prosecutor, he being afterwards partially indemnified from the public purse. The system long and successfully used in Ireland was, with very few modifications, recommended, as infinitely more efficient, and as not likely to add to the public burdens in the way of additional cost. A discussion followed, in the course of which some plan of official or Crown prosecutions was spoken of as on all accounts to be preferred to that in use, but doubts were expressed as to the advantage of selecting particular counsel for this purpose. Mr. T. W. Saunders recommended that the magistrates' clerk should be entrusted with the duty of prosecuting. The chairman expressed his belief that a system of Crown prosecutors, while certain to entail very large additional expense, would not remedy most of the evils complained of; and he doubted whether prosecutions in Ireland were as well conducted and as successful as the reader of the paper had implied. Mr. H. Crompton and Mr. Safford spoke in favour of the appointment of an official prosecutor, while Mr. Rose deprecated it as a dangerous infringement of the rights of Englishmen. In his reply Mr. Denny Urrin stated confidently that, although juries are unwilling to convict in a certain class of cases—agrarian and political—in Ireland, yet that the Crown solicitors get up the prosecutions with great care and ability, and that in Ireland, while no private individual is placed in the obnoxious position of a prosecutor, every exertion is made to prevent a failure of justice. Votes of thanks having been awarded to the lecturer and the chairman, the society adjourned.

THE DUBLIN LAW CLERKS' ASSOCIATION.

THE meeting preliminary to the annual general meeting was held last Monday evening, the president, Mr. F. M'Namara, in the chair. The scrutineers' report of the voting for officers and committee for 1877 was handed in. It declared the following gentlemen elected: Francis M'Namara, president; Edward Law, vice-president; E. J. Dodd, treasurer; W. O'Brien, secretary. Committee: John Dowling, A. Devereux, Alexander E. Jervise, J. Power, Thomas Flynn, James Donovan, Joseph M'Dermot, James La Prele, John Keegan, Edward Adams, and John Crook. Copies of the annual report of the outgoing committee for the year 1876 were delivered to the members. It dealt with the following subjects: The new branch of the association, which provides for the maintenance of members when sick or out of employment; the improved status and enlarged duties of law clerks, and the steady and continued influx of junior solicitors into the ranks of the salaried law clerks; the gradual and well sustained advance in salaries, and in the rate of remuneration for the preparation of costs; and concludes with offering the thanks of the association to the annual subscribers, and to E. Owen Armstrong, Esq., J. E. Madden, Esq., and others for donations of books. The secretary was directed to summon a meeting for Monday next, to receive and consider the report.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

THE usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, London, on Wednesday last, 14th Feb., Mr. E. Turner Payne (of Bath) presiding, the other directors present being Messrs. Brook, Hedger, Hunter, Lake, Paterson, Rickman, Smith, and Torr (Mr. Eiffe, secretary).

m of £205 was distributed in grants of 10s among the necessitous families of four-deceased members of the Profession, and a of £10 was made to a necessitous solicitor member. Three new members were added to the association, and other general business transacted.

that kind is a matter of ten or twelve days. I have now a case pending in the Chancery Division, where I issued a summons for discovery of defendant's documents on the 14th inst. This was made returnable, not the next day, but on the 17th inst. (or at an interval of two clear days), when an order was made, and (Sunday intervening) nothing more could be done until Monday, the 19th inst., when the summons, with the chief clerk's endorsement, was obtained with a direction that it should be taken to the Registrar to be drawn up. This done, the proposed order has to-day (Feb. 20) been obtained from the registrar, with instructions that notice must be given to the defendant (who is defending in person) to attend to sign it, in order that it may be passed. This, probably, he will decline to do, in which event I am to be furnished with a 'special appointment' to pass the order for Saturday next, and I shall then obtain the order passed and entered, and be in a position to serve it on Monday next, just twelve days after the summons was issued. Surely this is an anomaly, and a delay which is unfair both to practitioners and suitors, and should be rectified immediately."

A POINT affecting the title to property to a considerable extent, and one upon which there is apparently no precedent, was decided by the Exchequer Division in the case of Hand v. Hall. The action was brought to recover a quarter's rent under a memorandum signed by both the plaintiff and the defendant, by which "the plaintiff agreed to let, and the defendant agreed to take, the premises in question from the 14th Feb. next ensuing, until the following Midsummer twelve months, and with right at end of that term for the tenant by a month's previous notice to remain on for three and a half years more." The defendant never entered into possession, but at the time the action was brought a quarter's rent was in fact due. The plaintiff contended that this agreement was a lease, in which case rent would begin to run from the commencement of the demise, though no possession were taken. The validity of the lease thus came into question, and the defendant contended that being for a term of more than three years, a deed was necessary to make it valid. The Court (CLEASBY and POLLOCK, BB.) in a considered and written judgment, held that the term demised was for more than three years, and that a deed was therefore necessary to make the lease valid. In the course of the judgment they laid the rule down broadly thus: "We think a demise for three years and for three years longer at the option of the lessee, could not be said to be a lease not exceeding three years, and would not be valid if by parol only."

It is to be regretted that a case of such importance to the public as Jackson v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, in which judgment was delivered in the Court of Appeal last Saturday, should have resulted in a difference of opinion among the members of the court. The accident which led to the action was brought about by a state of facts which must be familiar to everyone who is in the habit of travelling by the Metropolitan Railway. Thirteen persons were travelling in a compartment constructed to hold only ten, and others made a rush at the carriage as the train was starting, opened the door, and tried to force their way in. The plaintiff, who was sitting next the door, rose to prevent their getting in, and in consequence of the presence of the three extra persons in the carriage he was pushed against the frame of the door by the motion of the train, at the same moment a porter slammed the door, and his thumb was crushed. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and the Court of Common Pleas, on motion to enter a nonsuit, unanimously held that there was evidence to go to the jury: (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 475.) The Court of Appeal was equally divided, COCKBURN, C.J. and AMPHLETT, J.A. holding that, looking at all the facts of the case, there was evidence of negligence, and the question was for the jury, KELLY, C.B. and BRAMWELL, J.A., on the contrary, being of opinion that there was no evidence, and the case ought to have been withdrawn from the jury. The court being equally divided the verdict for the plaintiff stands. The very existence of this difference of opinion appears of itself to afford some argument in favour of the view adopted by COCKBURN, C.J. and AMPHLETT, J.A., for since the decision of the House of Lords in Bridges v. The North London Railway Company (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 844) it has been perfectly clear that the question of negligence or no negligence is one of fact, and therefore the difference of opinion arose from the judges taking different views of the facts of the case. This seems to show of itself that there was a question of fact capable of more than one explanation. It is clear that the injury was caused by the wrongful act of somebody; it is equally clear that it was not caused by the wrongful act of the plaintiff himself; it is equally clear that it was in part caused by the wrongful acts of those persons who had already got into the compartment after it was full in spite of the plaintiff's objection, and of those who were trying to get in. The only question then is whether the acts of the company or their servants, in the management of the station and train, and the regulation of the traffic, amounted to negligence, and contributed to the accident. If the overcrowding was caused by a sudden and unexpected rush of passengers which the company could not be expected to provide against, and there were a sufficient staff of servants to regulate such traffic as could fairly be expected, and these servants did their best to prevent overcrowding, probably no reasonable jury would find a verdict against the company. On the other hand, if the occasion were one on which it must be known that there would be a crowd (as would be the case on a Bank Holiday or on Christmas Day), and there were only one or two servants on the platform, and no measures were taken to prevent overcrowding, the jury might not unreasonably come to the conclusion that there was negligence on the part of the company in carrying on their business, which brought about the accident. Surely all these questions are questions of fact for the jury, or as KEATING, J. said in Hogg v. The South Eastern Railway Company (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271), "If railway companies collect crowds for their own interest, it is for the jury to say what precautions they ought to take, and how far they have taken them."

THE MAINTENANCE OF BASTARDS BY UNIONS.

It is remarkable how modern legislation, in dealing with the maintenance of bastards and amending prior statutes on the same subject, has gradually lost sight of the main object which Parliament had in interfering at all. That object was not so much the relief of the mother as of overburdened ratepayers. We propose to refer shortly to past statutes and to the law as now regulated by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 9.

The common law recognised no obligation on the part of a father or mother to provide for the maintenance of his or her natural children; and, in case of neglect by the parents, the parish was bound to provide all that was required in the shape of necessities. Great expense was in this way incurred by the different parishes, and it became essential by statutory provisions to remedy the law, and to tax the cost of bastard children on the proper parties. That the sole and simple object of the Legislature was to afford relief to the various parishes and not to advantage the mother, clearly appears from the first statute that deals with this subject (18 Eliz. c. 3). That Act commences, "Justices of the peace shall order the punishment of the mother and reputed father of a bastard," and sect. 2 provides as follows. "Concerning bastards begotten and born out of lawful matrimony (an offence against God's law and man's law), the said bastards being now left to be kept at the charges of the parish where they be born, to the great burden of the same parish, and in defrauding of the relief of the impotent and aged true poor of the same parish, and to the evil example and encouragement of lewd life: it is ordained and enacted that two justices of the peace shall, and may by their discretion, take order, as well for the punishment of the mother and reputed father of such bastard child, as also for the better relief of every such parish, and shall and may likewise by like discretion, take order for the keeping of every such bastard child, by charging such mother or reputed father with the payment of money weekly," &c., under pain of imprisonment. The next statute is 7 Jac. 1, c. 4, s. 7, under which a woman having a bastard becoming chargeable to a parish might be committed to prison for twelve months with hard labour. A similar spirit pervaded the Act 6 Geo. 2, c. 31, and authorised the commitment to prison of a man where he was charged on oath with being the father of a bastard chargeable, or likely to become chargeable, to a parish "until he shall give security to indemnify such parish or place." The provisions of 18 Eliz. c. 3, were still further enlarged by 49 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 1, which enabled the reputed father of a bastard to be charged with expenses incident to the birth and order of affiliation, the former statute being found, "inadequate to the purposes of indemnifying parishes against the charges and expenses incurred by the apprehending and securing the reputed father." The objects of the several Acts of Parliament were for the more effectually indemnifying the parish from expense, and by giving it a more prompt remedy for attaching the putative father, and getting better security for his future appearance to answer an order of affiliation (1 Bott. 472; 2 Nolan, 286, 7). These Acts were virtually repealed by the Poor Law Amendment Act (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76), which cast the burden of maintaining an illegitimate child on the mother, and enabled the guardians of a parish or union, in case of the mother being unable to provide for a child's maintenance, to apply to the court of quarter sessions, who, after hearing the evidence on both sides, might make such order as was reasonable, "provided always that no such order shall be made unless the evidence of the mother of such bastard child shall be corroborated in some material particular by other evidence to the satisfaction of the court" (ss. 61 & 62). In the latter part of the section appears to be the origin of what is the defect in the present law; the evidence of the mother for the first time being apparently considered necessary. The law and procedure was again considerably altered by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which provided that henceforward, "All powers for obtaining or making an order upon any putative father for the maintenance of a bastard child, shall cease and determine, except as hereinafter provided." And as by virtue of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 76, the burden of maintaining an illegitimate child was cast on

Edwards (16 Beav. 357), see particularly the third class of cases there referred to, and Ingram v. Soutten (L. Rep. 7 E. & Ir. App. 408; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215, the conclusion at which we have arrived appears to us irresistible.

It is almost impossible to convey to the non-legal mind the endless varieties of difficulties likely to arise out of survivorship and substitutionary clauses, especially when evolved out of the little word "or," and made in favour of "descendants" or issue. In the case of Re Dawes we have, after much reference to authority, been enabled with some confidence to say that the issue of a deceased child take by substitution the share of their parent. Yet how faint an idea can anyone not a lawyer form of the questions to which such a gift to issue may not improbably give rise, as, for instance, in determining upon the class of issue entitled to be ascertained—whether issue predeceasing their parents take, whether issue must survive the tenant for life, whether the shares of issue taking by substitution are liable to divestment in favour of their issue (if any), whether such issue take inter se, per stirpes or per capita, whether as joint tenants or as tenants in common, &c. We are no advocates of verbosity or prolixity, but the outcry of many testators against the lawyers on this score is for the most part an insensate outcry born of ignorance. People not otherwise fools are apt to "rush in" with foolish brevity where lawyers "fear to tread." The limit which divides brevity from obscurity is very easily overpassed.

Another set of questions arising out of these survivorship clauses has been the subject of much criticism in the recent case of Beckwith v. Beckwith, in which the Appeal Court, consisting of five members, unanimously reversed the judgment of Sir C. Hall. Here, as stated 25 W. Rep. 282, a testator gave his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to divide the same among all such of his daughters, A. B. C. D. and E., as should be living at his death in equal shares; the share of each daughter to be held by his trustees for such daughter for life, with remainder in trust for her children, and in default of children (and subject to a general power of appointment as to £2000), the testator declared that as well as the original share of such daughter as any share which might accrue to her under his will should accrue "to his other daughters or other daughter surviving." All the daughters having survived the testator, D. died, leaving an infant son, and subsequently E. died a spinster. The Court of Appeal, reversing Vice-Chancellor Hall, (who had decided that the gift over to "other daughters surviving" ought to be construed as surviving at the testator's death), held that the period of survivorship referred to the death of any daughter without leaving children, and, therefore, that on the death of E. her share (subject to an appointment of £2000 by her will), had vested in A. B. and C. her surviving sisters. The case is of great value, and very instructive as a forcible illustration of the rule we have been considering, as to the period to which survivorship is to be referred, and as also showing that without a controlling context, survivor means survivor in the strict sense, and relates prima facie to an indefinite survivorship inter se rather than to survivorship at the death of a testator, or to survivorship at any period other than that of the death of the first taker, that survivorship will not, without something like clear necessity, be construed to mean the surviving a testator; also that without a clear implication "survivor" means "survivor" and not "other." By comparing Beckwith v. Beckwith with the decision of the Appeal Court in Wake v. Varah (L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 248; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 437), it will, we think, be possible, generally speaking, to determine with some considerable degree of certainty, whether there be or be not a context sufficient to control the natural or strict construction of the word "survivor." The form of the gift over, if such there be, not infrequently supplies an almost irresistible argument in favour of the more liberal construction under which "survivor" is read "other," as is well exemplified by Wake v. Varah.

TRUSTEES IN BANKRUPTCY AND THE LAW OF ESTOPPEL.

By the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict., c. 76), sect. 142, it is enacted that "The bankruptcy or insolvency of the plaintiff in any action which the assignees might maintain for the benefit of the creditors shall not be pleaded in bar to such action, unless the assignees shall decline to continue and give security for the costs thereof, upon a judge's order to be obtained for that purpose, within such reasonable time as the judge may order, but the proceedings may be stayed until such election is made, and in case the assignees neglect or refuse to continue the action and give such security within the time limited by the order the defendant may, within eight days after such neglect or refusal, plead the bankruptcy." And by the General Rules of Trinity Term, 1853 (22 & 23), it is further in substance provided that where a plea puis darrein continuance is pleaded the plaintiff shall be at liberty to confess such plea, and shall be entitled to the costs of the cause up to the time of pleading such plea. The case of Bennett (Trustee, &c.) v. Gamgee and another (35 L. T. Rep., N. S. 764), was concerned with the interpretation of these provisions. In it the plaintiff having elected under sect. 142 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, not to proceed with and give security for the costs of an action originally commenced by his debtors, whereupon the defendants pleaded the liquidation puis darrein continuance, which plea was confessed by the plaintiffs, who signed judgment for their costs up to the time of the plea, under the rules above mentioned, estopped or prevented him from bringing a fresh action with respect to the same subject-matter with which the first was concerned. The Exchequer Division of the High Court, consisting of Chief Baron Kelly and Baron Cleasby, held that he was not, but we think that more than one strong reason could be produced to show that their decision is not altogether satisfactory.

The question naturally divides itself into two branches. First, was the plaintiff trustee estopped from proceeding in the second action by reason of the confession of the plea puis darrein continuance made by his debtors in the first? On this head we shall take the liberty of quoting at some length from a judgment delivered by that eminent lawyer the late Mr. Justice Willes in a case of Newington v. Levy (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 70; on appeal, Id. 595), in which he laid down the proper interpretation that should be put upon the rules discussed in Bennett v. Gamgee. "We are of opinion," he said (721), "that the intention of rules 22 and 23 of Trinity Term, 1853, was not merely to allow the plaintiff to enter a nolle prosequi to the particular action, receiving costs instead of paying them, but to put an end to the litigation altogether as it stands at the time of the confession, the plaintiff electing to abandon the claim as it then exists, and to let the defendant go free in consideration of receiving the costs of the action which was properly commenced though met by an answer of matter subsequently arising. . . . We are satisfied that the intention of the rules of court, which it is observable have the force of a statute was to place the plaintiff making confession of the plea for the purpose of obtaining costs in substantially the same position as a defendant confessing the action; that the defendant is entitled upon such a confession to a final judgment that he go without day; that the effect is not that of a mere nolle prosequi, upon which the plaintiff would not have received costs, and that the plaintiff cannot afterwards assert in a fresh action any claim which he might have set up in the action he has bartered away." In addition to the judges, we have mentioned the decision in Newington v. Levy was approved by such authorities as Baron Bramwell and Justices Blackburn, Lush, Keating, and Montague Smith, and indeed in Bennett v. Gamgee its binding force was not denied, the judges merely endeavouring to distinguish it from the case before them. Baron Cleasby said that there could be no doubt that the debtors themselves would by the effect of the rules of Trinity Term be estopped from bringing another action, because the fact of their cause of action having once been the subject of a judgment, would be a complete answer to any fresh suit by the same parties for the same cause. "But," proceeded the learned Baron, "I am at a loss to see on what possible ground this can be put forward as a bar to the trustee's action, which has not been the subject of any judgment." The ground it is submitted would be that estoppels bind privies as well as parties, and that the trustee would in this connection be the insolvents' privy in or by operation of law. Privy, we are told, denotes mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property (Greenleaf on the Law of Evidence, I. 216 sect. 189; Taylor on Evidence, I. 696). Bankruptcy might well be termed commercial death, and it is thought that there is precisely the same kind of privity between a bankrupt and his trustee as there would be between a deceased and his executor.

But, secondly, it may, we think, be asked, on what grounds a trustee, having once elected quâ trustee to abandon an action, should be permitted, still acting in the capacity of trustee, to bring a fresh action for the same cause? It is certainly not laid down in terms in sect. 142 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, that he shall be debarred from bringing such fresh action, but what is the necessary implication from the words used? What is the object and design of giving a man an "election?" Clearly that the election should be final and not rendered nugatory by the party to whom it is given being permitted to blow hot and cold at his own pleasure. Regarding the question in this light we think that two cases (Kinnear v. Tarrant, 15 East, 622, and Briggs v. Cox, 7 D. & R. 409), which were quoted on behalf of the plaintiff by his counsel in Bennett v. Gamgee are, if properly understood, authorities for the defendants. "The principles," said Justice Bayley, in the latter case (410), "laid down by the court in Kinnear v. Tarrant have explained and corrected some former cases in which it was held that assignees might proceed with actions commenced by bankrupts, and have decided that defendants may insist upon stopping such actions, and may compel assignees to become plaintiffs, and the reason of it is that it may thus be made to appear upon the record to whom the payment enforced by the judgment has been made. Then if assignees cannot proceed with a former action in the name of the bankrupt, it is clear that they may commence a new action in their own names, for else they would have no remedy at all." Both these cases were decided in the first quarter of the present century, but now, inasmuch as a trustee can "proceed paid to magistrates' clerks throughout England and Wales. In 1851 an Act passed which gave the option of paying the clerks of justices by salary in lieu of fees. There can be no doubt that a compulsory measure would have become law long ago but for the difficulty of fixing upon a scale of fees applicable alike to town and country districts. This purpose has now been wisely abandoned, and various scales are proposed. We understand that the Justices' Clerks' Society is watching the progress of the present Bill, to which there are many objections as regards its details. We publish elsewhere a letter from an experienced clerk to justices of a large borough, which deserves attention, especially at the hands of magistrates' clerks.

In our last issue we announced that Mr. Biggar had given notice of the rejection of the Legal Practitioners' Bill. We now find that Mr. Biggar has adopted a similar course with regard to a number of other Bills, notably the Oxford and Cambridge University Bill, the Irish Judicature Bill, and the Justices' Clerks' Bill. But it looks as if the honourable gentleman's opposition amounts to all smoke and no fire, for to the last-named Bills he has in fact offered no opposition whatever, not even taking any part in the debates. This kind of opposition is in one sense rather to be courted, for while it does no harm, it misleads others who would, but for such notices, take action, perhaps without occasion, against a Bill.

We draw especial attention to a case of Brown v. Dodds, disposed of in the Sunderland County Court, and reported in our last issue, page 285. The question was one of costs, and it was successfully contended by the defendant's solicitor, before the learned judge, that in a case where a sum of less than £5 was recovered by way of damages, the scale of costs under sect. 8 of the County Court Act 1875 does not apply. This view was upheld by the court on the ground that sect. 91 of the County Courts Act 1846 still applied to the above case, notwithstanding subsequent legislation, so that in regard to cases like the present the recent County Court scale of costs under the Act of 1875 was ultra vires, and could not be acted upon. Our readers are, no doubt, aware that the recent scale provides for fees to counsel in cases where less than £5 is recovered. In any case it would be impossible to defend such a provision unless in most exceptional cases.

THE process of foreign attachment as used in the Mayor's Court of the City of London, is highly prized by the merchants and business men of the metropolis. The forms and proceedings, however, by which this particular machinery is set in motion, are still of a very antiquated character. The plaintiff is first issued by the plaintiff against his debtor, and while the debtor is left in blissful ignorance of this having been done, the garnishee is served with attachment by the Serjeant at Mace. This done, a summons is issued against the garnishee, which runs thus, "You are hereby summoned to be and appear in the Queen's Majesty's Court to be holden before the Mayor and Aldermen in the Chamber of the Guildhall," &c. We are not aware that the expression "Queen's Majesty's Court" is to be found elsewhere in any forms of legal process. It clearly recognises the fact, however, that the Mayor's Court derives its authority from the Crown, although in the ordinary process of this court, there is no such recognition nor are any such words used as those above given used in such process.

As we pointed out in our last issue, the Official Referees' Courts are unpopular with the Profession. Why is this? First, because the selection of the Government in filling these newly-created offices was not entirely matter for congratulation. The most experienced lawyers at the Bar should have been offered these posts. Secondly, the fees payable by suitors before these tribunals operate to drive lawyers and their clients to other courts where fees are less burdensome. As to this we are very glad to notice Mr. Martin's proposal in the House of Commons that such fees should be reduced at once. A very little need be done to make these useful tribunals popular, for the referees are required to sit de die in diem, and clients can instruct solicitors to appear and conduct their cases for them without being at the additional expense of counsel's fees. First-rate men are wanted as referees and a substantial reduction of the court fees, which ought to be charged upon a different principle to that which now obtains. This done, and, as we pointed out last week, the common law masters would not then be occupied with references when they should be despatching the ordinary business at Judges' Chambers. The fact is, these masters ought to be left entirely free for chamber work—i.e., summonses and taxing costs, their attendance at Westminster might well be dispensed with, as their duties could be undertaken by subordinates, as is the case with the associates of the High Court, and certain masters should be appointed to deal exclusively with taxation of costs, by which means greater uniformity in regard to taxations would be once secured.

A RECENT visit to the Master of the Rolls Court, in Rolls-yard, Chancery-lane, would almost have led one to suppose it was long vacation time. The court is closed, or was so during the middle of the week. The business of this court (including some very heavy cases actually waiting for trial) is thus now completely at a standstill. Sir George Jessel is sitting in the Court of Appeal as president of that court, two of the judges of the court being on circuit. But, worse still, neither members of the Bar nor solicitors can learn when the Rolls Court will open again, and this in face of the fact that one of the cases which would be sure to be in the paper involves the examination of witnesses who are in distant parts of the country. Under the old procedure this uncertainty was never experienced. It was then only a question of waiting a term or two. The business in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls is not of course at a standstill; but as recently as Wednesday last a solicitor's clerk, on applying for a two hours' appointment on a summons to proceed with certain inquiries directed by a decree, was informed that no such appointment could be given until after the Easter Vacation, owing to the pressure of business in the chambers. London solicitors often find it difficult to satisfy country solicitors for whom they are agents, as to the cause for delay in this matter or that action; but this difficulty is increased tenfold when a solicitor's client inquires of his solicitor the cause of delay in getting his matters disposed of in a particular court or in particular chambers. The localisation of business is, as we affirmed in our last issue, page 275, the true and only permanent remedy for the existing state of things.

ALMOST every solicitor practising in the Isle of Man is styled an advocate, and in many parts of Scotland and Ireland solicitors are so styled when they are in the habit of practising in the local courts. We notice in Waterlow's Solicitors' Diary many country solicitors in England and Wales are also so described. We see no reason why the term advocate should not be used and applied to all country solicitors who habitually practise before County Courts and in police courts. This would prove of use to solicitors in London and elsewhere, when instructing a local advocate on behalf of a client requiring to be represented in a local court.

A CORRESPONDENT in writing to us upon the subject of the continued encroachments of unauthorised persons upon the Profession, calls attention to the fact that solicitors themselves are unwise enough to give occasional encouragement to such persons. He says: "Would you believe that some solicitors encourage these men? A case came under my notice this week. A London solicitor, whose address I enclose, sent a writ, copy, and affidavit of service, addressed to the high bailiff of the County Court here, and asking him to allow his clerk to serve writ and make affidavit, and on return of papers, the solicitor promised 7s. 6d., the proper charge being 14s. 7d. I call this a breach of etiquette, and certainly not likely to raise the standard of the solicitors' Profession." No doubt the more usual course is to employ local solicitors as agents to effect service of process, and this should be followed as far as possible for obvious reasons. On the other hand, a high bailiff of a County Court is certainly the one person, outside the Profession, who may be properly employed for such a purpose being paid of course the proper charge. The only danger is that under bailiffs are often employed who are not always too particular as to the mode of service.

WE frequently hear of proposals for the amalgamation of the two branches of the Profession. To this we have always been opposed, though we insist upon the absolute necessity for a freer interchange between the two branches. An amalgamation of another kind is in contemplation; that between the English and Irish Bars, and we are bound to say that while here and there it might prove disadvantageous to certain members of the Bar, it is a proposed reform which deserves the support of the public and the Profession. Any scheme which serves to widen the present narrow limits of the profession of the Bar, that is, which serves to admit a greater number of men into the same field of labour, must tend to produce better advocates and better lawyers than would otherwise be the case. In the House of Commons, on the 13th, Sir Colman O'Loughlin introduced a Bill to enable members of the Bar of England to practise in Ireland, and members of the Bar of Ireland to practise in England, and further to empower Her Majesty to assign, by commission of assize, judges of the High Court of Justice in Ireland to go circuit in England, and judges of the High Court of Justice in England to go circuit in Ireland. The Bill was read a first time, and we propose to publish the same in our next issue.

THE president of what we will call the mixed division (Probate, Admiralty, and Divorce), Sir James Hannen, has recently offered some useful observations on points of practice which must not be overlooked by solicitors. In a divorce case of Robinson v. Robinson an application was made to the court to strike out a portion of the respondent's answer, which charged the petitioner with adultery on many occasions. This novel application was made on the still more novel ground that by a verdict of a jury on a previous trial these very charges were found to be not proved; indeed, negative. The judge refused the application, and in doing so observed "The application is not founded on any affidavit, but is based on the assumption that, as I was the judge before whom the issues of the former petition were tried, I have judicial knowledge of the same charges that were in issue. This is a mistake. All applications that involve a reference to another cause should be supported by an affidavit of some facts, because it is a mere accident the same judge presides on two occasions. If I were to make the order prayed for, there would be nothing to show the grounds upon which I have proceeded. But, apart from that question, I think the respondent is entitled to insist on the question being raised by replication, in which it will be incumbent on the petitioner to state with exactness the facts on which she relies to show the respondent is estopped from setting up the charges he now makes." Another point arose in an ordinary suit for judicial separation, in which the allegation that the respondent was living in adultery, was, in part, proved by the evidence of the petitioner's solicitor, who swore that the respondent told him the name of the person with whom she was so living. In granting a decree of judicial separation as prayed the President said, "I hope what I am about to say will be remembered and acted upon by solicitors. It is very disadvantageous that evidence should be cut down to a minimum, casting upon the Court, in some instances, the task of drawing inferences from very slight facts. It is to be remembered that these are not suits similar to those in other divisions, in which only the parties are interested, but the public are supposed to be interested in these litigations being conducted in a particular manner, so that the court should be satisfied that there is no 'arrangement' between the parties to bring about a decision of the Court—an arrangement where the petitioner is not seeking in some covert manner to obtain the decree of the court for a purpose other than the relief from the marriage tie. It is obvious, if the court were to act simply upon a letter written by one of the parties, it would give the greatest facility for such an arrangement. In the court which this division now represents, it has not been the custom to rely only upon the confessions of the party. I do not lay down a legal proposition that the court will not do so; but it is to be remembered it is only in cases of absolute necessity that a confession of the party alone should be relied upon, and where the evidence of the adultery is to be obtained it should be brought before the court. If I find the warning I am now giving, and which I have before adverted to, is not acted upon, I shall be obliged to postpone such cases until further evidence is obtained." We entirely agree with the observations of the learned Judge, but as to what causes the effect of which the President of the Court here complains, it is only fair to solicitors to say, that it arises from a desire on their part to save suitors in this division expense by offering in support of a case that evidence which is most immediately at hand, such as confessions and letters. As a rule, however, the witness box is not the place for a solicitor, especially when it is for the purpose of giving evidence of certain admissions made by the opposite party, it not being in contemplation at the time that such admissions or statements would be so given in evidence. We do not say there is anything at all irregular in a solicitor giving such evidence, but it is a practice which solicitors will do well to discourage, as it would tend to their degenerating into mere agents for obtaining evidence. While referring to the business of this division of the High Court, we take the opportunity of reproducing Sir James Hannen's observations in a recent case about the use of printed forms of wills and the litigation and expense that too frequently follows from their use. The judge pointed out the extreme treat as professional misconduct, to be visited by a sentence of dismission, the transaction of business on agency terms, which is the common custom of the legal profession.

5. That Bills be promoted by parliamentary agents only, but that oppositions to Bills may be conducted either by parliamentary agents or "other persons, whether on the roll or not."

It will be seen that the effect of these regulations is the separation of parliamentary agency from the profession of the law, and its constitution as a separate profession; in other words, the creation of a new and restricted body, holding a precisely similar position to that which the body of proctors formerly held with respect to probate and divorce business. The committee has adopted and recommends the same principle of restricting and subdividing professional duties of a legal nature into different sections, which Parliament distinctly negatived when it united the proctors to the general body of solicitors, and the ecclesiastical advocates to the general body of barristers: and on previous occasions when it threw open the Lord Mayor's Court of London to the general body of the Profession, when it abolished the exclusive privileges of the serjeants-at-law, and when it extinguished the ancient institution of the Six Clerks in the Court of Chancery.

That this object, the creation of a distinct and narrow body, is intended by the leading members of the committee, is shown by the language of paragraph 4 of Lord Redesdale's draft report, where he says: "The committee, considering (inter alia) that uniformity of practice is best secured when the practitioners are not too numerous, and can afford to devote themselves exclusively to the duties of their profession, are of opinion that it is not desirable to increase indefinitely the number of parliamentary agents, and that the examination test should be of such a character as to exclude all persons not qualified for actual practice." Further, a recommendation proposed by Mr. Adam in his evidence, and adopted by Lord Redesdale in his draft report, to the effect that parliamentary agents must reside within half a mile of Parliament, and be in constant personal attendance at their offices, points distinctly to the exclusion of Lincoln's-inn and city firms from the conduct of parliamentary business. It is true that these proposed paragraphs were struck out in settling the report; but notwithstanding this, the actual recommendations are pointed in the same direction; and the evidence of Mr. Adam and Mr. Warner, the two parliamentary officers who are specially attached to Lord Redesdale, show that their feeling in reference to the future arrangement for the appointment of parliamentary agents is not so much to exclude the practitioners who may creep into the business without any legal knowledge, training, or education, as to impose such difficulties as shall, as far as possible, exclude those members of the trained and educated legal profession who consider that parliamentary practice is not beyond the power of an educated lawyer to acquire, and that parliamentary business, which practically lasts about six months of the year, is not so difficult that it may not be combined with other branches of legal practice. For example, Mr. Adam's evidence shows his very strong leaning in favour of a small and limited body of parliamentary agents, and against solicitors. See his evidence, qq. 158 to 162 and 177 to 185, especially the following passages:

"The parliamentary agents may be divided into two classes. First, those who devote themselves exclusively to the practice of their profession; and, secondly, those who act also as solicitors in ordinary practice, and who transact the greater part of their parliamentary work through what they call their parliamentary clerks (a thing unheard of in former times, and in my opinion greatly to be deprecated). The first class, with scarcely an exception, perform their duties to Parliament and to their clients in a most satisfactory manner. . . . In all these respects, the second class as a body are in strong contrast to the first. So far from assisting Parliament, they are, from their want of practical knowledge, an absolute and great hindrance to business. They are constantly making blunders, out of which the officers have to do their best to assist them, sometimes unsuccessfully.

"Do you consider that restricting the work of parliamentary agency to solicitors or barristers would be expedient or not?—I do not think that it is at all expedient; some of our very best agents are neither solicitors nor barristers.

"That may be so; but do you think that if we are to make rules which are to confine the practice to persons who are held to be specially qualified for the purpose, the introduction that, as one of the qualifications, he should be a solicitor, may not be of advantage?—I do not think it an advantage; my experience is just the other way; I find that where a parliamentary agent is also a solicitor, in too many cases the suitor has to pay two solicitors and one very bad parliamentary agent."

"Surely you cannot consider the qualification of an acquaintance with the business of a solicitor to be objectionable in a parliamentary agent?—Not at all; but, on the other hand, I do not think it indispensable.

"Would not the examination which a barrister or a solicitor necessarily passes be a qualification towards acting as a parliamentary agent?—Certainly not; it has nothing whatever to do with parliamentary agency.

"Of course it does not give him a knowledge of standing orders or anything of that kind, but to a certain extent it would be a qualification, would it not?—I do not think it would the least in the world as a parliamentary agent."

In one respect Mr. Adam is inaccurate. The principal solicitors who combine parliamentary with general practice, attend to it personally just as much as gentlemen who are parliamentary agents and not lawyers. It will also be observed that Mr. Adam draws no distinction between trained and educated lawyers who understand and personally conduct their own parliamentary business, and the persons without legal training or education, whom the present state of things has allowed to creep into practice, and to exclude whom for the future is the real object to be attained. Mr. Adam does not say if the instances which he quotes are derived from the former or latter class, but he mixes the two classes together. As Mr. Adam was not educated as a lawyer, he does not understand that a knowledge of practice is not nearly so important and difficult in acquisition as is a comprehensive acquaintance with the principles of law, and with the numerous and important range of subjects with which the statute law of the United Kingdom deals, and of all which a parliamentary agent should have an adequate knowledge. But Mr. Warner, counsel to Lord Redesdale, shows his strong bias in a still more marked way; and it led him into a most singular mistake. His duty is to criticize the draft Bills deposited in Parliament, and to submit them, with his notes, to the Lord Chairman. He came before the committee prepared with Bills which he produced for the express purpose of illustrating the bad drafts which came before him from what he called the unqualified class; and the first he produced was from the office of a very eminent firm of solicitors, who unite a considerable parliamentary practice to a very large agency and general practice. On this he had noted: "This Bill must be sent to counsel to be properly drawn; it is unworthy of a great corporation."

I cannot show the infelicity of Mr. Warner's selection better than by reading a short extract from the speech of the Lord Chancellor, delivered in the House of Lords on the 24th July 1876. He said: "I find that one of the instances of the necessity for that which was given was in reference to an important Bill upon a subject which has in some way or other attracted considerable attention out of doors, a Bill which passed through the House conferring certain powers upon the corporation of Birmingham last year; and when it came into his office, I am informed by a communication, the counsel of my noble friend said that the Bill must be sent to counsel to prepare and draft, and that it was unworthy of a great corporation like that of Birmingham to submit to Parliament so important a Bill without its being submitted first to counsel to be properly settled; and he said that the Bill had been introduced by a parliamentary agent who was a member of a large firm of solicitors, but not in much practice as a parliamentary agent. Now, I am authorized to say that this Bill was drawn by Mr. Reilly. I have myself seen the Bill; I have occasion to see the learned counsel about various things, and I have seen this Bill, and I am bound to say that a more properly drawn Bill, a Bill more worthy of being termed a work of art with respect to the manner in which it is drafted, I have not seen; and I consider it a very unfortunate instance to bring forward to sustain charges of that kind made before the committee."

I cannot but believe that had that Bill reached Mr. Warner's hands from a member of the Parliamentary Agents' Society, his note would have been different, and would in any event have been couched in less peremptory language.

I venture to think that this policy—the narrowing of the body of Parliamentary agents—so far from being a benefit to the public, would be a serious injury; and if the business is to be limited to those who devote themselves entirely to it, very serious injury will accrue to the public. The mischief of this is very well put by Mr. Theodore Martin, representing the small body of twenty-two gentlemen who call themselves the Parliamentary Agents' Society, in his evidence (q. 87); and the statement is the more valuable that he did not see the irresistible inference to be drawn from it, but gave it for another and different purpose. He says: "In the pressure of business very important transactions, have to be concluded; we are all very much hurried because there are, perhaps, several committees sitting which we have to look after: many of these transactions involve enormous sums: they are very important things: between ourselves I have known these transactions concluded by mere word of mouth: we say 'so and so and so and so' is agreed. Now we have not time to put this in writing. I trust to your seeing it carried out before the committee."

I apprehend that respectable firms of solicitors may be trusted to carry out verbal arrangements equally with the twenty-two gentlemen who, Mr. Martin thinks, are alone trustworthy. But this evidence explains the serious injury to the public of too narrow a body of Parliamentary agents. Ten or twelve committees are often sitting at the same time during the busy part of the season, besides the Examiners and Standing Order Committees: and it often happens that some of the leading Parliamentary agents are each employed in five, six, or seven different rooms at the same time. Counsel are engaged in the same way; and it often happens, entirely from this cause, that business involving enormous sums is transacted or hurried through in the absence of the professional assistance on which a country solicitor is relying, with corresponding injury and anxiety to the parties mainly interested, and to the public.

I now come to the conditions which are requisite for a Parliamentary agent: and I cannot do better than take the statement of the very eminent gentleman whom I have mentioned, Mr. Theodore Martin. He considers (q. 130) they are—

1. That he should be liberally educated.
2. That he should have a general knowledge of law.
3. That he should have the special knowledge required for Parliamentary practice.

As regards the first, it is one of the special requisites which the Incorporated Law Society has provided for; nothing need be said as to it. As regards the second, I warmly agree in the high importance of a knowledge of law, and I deem it the great and principal requisite. But I see no method of securing that training and education in the common and statute law of England, which are the great and important part of a Parliamentary agent's knowledge, other than a thorough and adequate professional training. It is the great and high importance of this knowledge and training upon which I base my contention, that Parliamentary agency is a branch of the great profession of the law, and that the members of that branch ought to attain to it through the same preliminary steps as are prescribed for the practice of all other branches of the law. These preliminary steps and that preliminary training have been required in the interest of the public, and the public suffers if a due and thorough legal training—not a mere amateur study, but such a study as a professional lawyer is alone likely to undertake—be not made a primary requisite. That training and education can alone be obtained by requiring that Parliamentary agents must be lawyers.

The report of the joint committee is very strong on this point. It says (par. 5): "The profession of a parliamentary agent requires an accurate acquaintance with particular branches of the law, and especially with the practice of Parliament; also a sound knowledge of parliamentary drafting." But the means of securing this "accurate acquaintance with particular branches of law," comprising, in fact, nearly all the chief branches, are singularly inadequate. By par. 10 it is advised that not only lawyers, but any graduate of a university, and any person who shall have passed a Civil Service examination, may apply to undergo the special examination "directed to ascertain his fitness for immediate practice as a parliamentary agent," which, Lord Redesdale stated in the House of Lords, would be merely in parliamentary practice.

What is the objection to requiring a legal training? Mr. Adam seems to think the fact of a few parliamentary officers having given up their position in 1836 in order to commence practising the profession of a parliamentary agent is a sufficient ground, and it is the only alleged objection. But these gentlemen had acquired their legal knowledge in Parliament, and were, no doubt, thoroughly fitted for their duties. There is no ground to apprehend a second parliamentary exodus; and the only consequence of admitting, in future, untrained lawyers as parliamentary agents is, that a class of men, who have acquired some knowledge of parliamentary practice as working clerks in large offices, will be enabled to set up on their own account without having gone through the adequate legal study and training which is required from every other branch of the legal profession.

Mr. Martin's objection to a legal training is more difficult to understand. He was a duly admitted Scotch solicitor, and practised for many years in the Supreme Court of Scotland; but he tells us that several of the younger members of parliamentary houses have joined the old houses, and "educated themselves specially for the profession of parliamentary agents without having served their articles, or being called to the Bar. "These," he says, "are men who have all had, first, a liberal education, and generally a special education, more or less legal." But the Legislature does not consider that an education "more or less legal" is a proper qualification for practising the other branches of the law, that an education "more or less medical" is a sufficient preparation for practising as a recognised physician or surgeon, or an education "more or less nautical," a suitable training for the command of an ocean steamer. I have no reason to suppose that the gentlemen referred to by Mr. Martin are not duly qualified, but I strongly urge that it would have been more satisfactory to the public and to those gentlemen's own clients if they had been articled at the beginning of their studies, and had possessed a duly authorized certificate of an adequate legal education, instead of a vague testimonial of having had "an education more or less legal."

I now come to the third of Mr. Martin's requisites—a knowledge of parliamentary practice—which, in his view, and in that of some other witnesses, and more especially of Mr. Adam, seems to be the all-important requisite, and to be so difficult as to require those who have learned it to be constituted into a separate profession framed on the model of the old proctors. Lord Cairns, in his speech, already quoted, says of it: "I want to know what parliamentary practice really is, and it will be necessary to agree upon some definition of it. But, my Lords, there is this objection to such an examination, that any special examination upon only a limited number of subjects must necessarily be considerably smaller and more restricted than examinations into general subjects; and I do maintain that persons who are fit to be on the roll of solicitors, and fit to be called to the Bar, are undoubtedly fit to practise as parliamentary agents in your Lordships' House, or in the other House of Parliament, and they would in a few weeks, or even in a few days, be able to acquire all the special knowledge which it is necessary to obtain in order to promote the passage of private Bills through Parliament."

I will venture to give my own experience on the subject, which fully bears out his Lordship's remarks. In the year 1854 I was advised to undertake parliamentary business. I was then a practising solicitor, and had served a part of my articles to a firm which conducted parliamentary business, but I had not previously had any personal practice in parliamentary agency. I decided, after consulting one or two experienced friends, to do so. I very carefully studied the standing orders and May's Parliamentary Practice, and compiled for my own use out of the somewhat dislocated code a systematic book of practice with reference to the promotion of private Bills. With that study I undertook the promotion of a private Bill, carried it through in face of a very serious opposition in both Houses, and in doing so I avoided a pitfall of practice which then existed, into which my opponent, the principal partner of one of the three great houses so much praised by the officers of the houses for their perfect knowledge of their duties, fell; the consequence of his error being that all my opponent's witnesses were excluded from giving evidence before the House of Lords. Whether the result would have been different I do not of course know, but my opponent's error of practice led to the inability of his clients to put their case before the committee. I should hardly have thought well to bring this fact forward but for the very strong language used by the witnesses who gave evidence before the joint committee as to the errors made by solicitors who undertake Parliamentary practice as contrasted with the alleged perfection of the select body of agents in performance of their duties.

It is true that outside the standing orders there is a small quantity of unwritten practice which has to be acquired, consisting chiefly of routine work, as to the particular departments of the two Houses in which Bills and amendments have to be deposited, when and how they are to be printed, when and how they are to be settled, and the House Bills lodged and examined; also the conduct of opposed standing order cases, the memorials relating to which are certainly specimens of special pleading which would have rejoiced the heart of a special pleader of half a century ago. But the whole of this practice is not nearly so difficult as the practice of the Chancery Division of the Supreme Court, and its acquisition would be rendered comparatively easy by the preparation of a small body of rules or some addition to the present standing orders.

There is one branch of the report which treats of a totally different subject, viz., the division of profits between solicitors and agents, a system which prevails generally between country solicitors and their London agents in ordinary law business. For some reason this is supposed to lead to utter dishonesty and manufacturing of improper and irregular charges. Mr. Adam says that "in his opinion it is one great cause for the degenerate state into which he is afraid parliamentary agency is falling;" and even Mr. Martin indulges in an imputation that an agent who charges on this system "has sacrificed his independence, and will not deal with the proofs of witnesses in the same way as he (the witness) and others who do not participate in profits do." It is strange that such imputations should be made. I never heard the system usual among solicitors, as regard their general business, charged with any such consequences; and, moreover, the illustration given by Mr. Martin—viz., the unnecessary increase of the quantity of evidence for the purpose of increasing cost—is a wrongful act, the inducement for which exists, whether the practice of the legal profession be adopted or not. A parliamentary agent, whether he shares fees or not, receives considerable additional charges if a case before committee be protracted over three days, which ought to be concluded in two; but I never heard suggestions of wilful, and therefore dishonest, prolongation made against parliamentary agents on this ground. I cannot help expressing my surprise at such imputations being made by them, and my conviction that they are wholly unfounded and unworthy of the very eminent gentleman by whom they were stated to the committee. Cases of malpractice may have taken place with some of the untrained practitioners who now creep in; but with legal firms of eminence such unprincipled conduct is as unknown and impossible as with Mr. Martin's own firm: and the division or non-division of profits does not affect the question.

The real error as regards costs is the existence of two separate sets of costs for the solicitor and the parliamentary agent, by which, in many cases work is doubly paid for, and the labours of a taxing-master increased. Parliament ought to fix a particular remuneration for a particular work—by whomsoever done—and to let that work be charged for in one bill and not two separate bills. It has, in fact, made some provision pointing in that direction, by providing, as to a few of the scale charges, that if the solicitor act as Parliamentary agent he should receive for a certain attendance the double fee. Great trouble and confusion are caused by the separation. I have known much time and trouble devoted by Mr. Adam, as taxing-master, to the question whether certain work ought to be done by the solicitor or the parliamentary agent, and to treat it as a serious ground of complaint that work was done by one which in the usual course should be done by the other; and even to insist so rigorously on the usual routine, as to require the charges to be transferred from the one bill to the other before he would tax the bills. But this is really a question which it is not within the duty of Parliament to interfere with; and, recollecting as I do how very strongly the present Government (in the debates on the Agricultural Holdings Act) insisted on the great importance of upholding the sacred rights of "freedom of contract," I can hardly believe that they will sanction so complete a violation of that rule as to render the private agreements between solicitors and agents a matter of public investigation. I venture to think that if the future admission of agents were restricted to the educated and trained lawyers of the country, and the system of charging placed on a simple and intelligible basis, instead of the duplicated plan which now exists, we should hear no more of such complaints.

I now proceed to sum up the objections which appear to me to exist to the recommendations of the report of the joint committee.

1. They make no provision that parliamentary agents shall in future be trained and educated lawyers, but they specially propose that any graduate or person who has passed an examination by the Civil Service Commissioners may become a parliamentary agent on passing a special examination in parliamentary practice. This recommendation is made, notwithstanding they had previously reported that "an accurate acquaintance with particular branches of the law" was required. It is surely a serious injury to the public, that, if accurate knowledge of law is required, an authoritative diploma conferring a right to practise shall be granted, not to trained lawyers, but to gentlemen who have received what Mr. Martin calls "an education more or less legal."

2. It is a serious injury to the legal profession, who have paid the necessary stamps and gone through the special training necessary to acquire the accurate knowledge of law required by the committee, that the most valuable and lucrative branch of professional practice should be entrusted to persons who have not taken the prescribed steps to obtain that culture, but who may have picked up sufficient knowledge to get through the special examination in practice without having performed the conditions which the Legislature has (in the public interest) imposed upon those who wish to become members of an honourable profession. Still more is it an injury that solicitors should be out off from that direct access to Parliament on behalf of their clients which they formerly possessed.

3. The restriction of the Profession of a parliamentary agent to a small body consisting of comparatively few members, is a most serious injury to the public, and will infallibly lead to the members of that body being habitually occupied in several committee rooms at the same time, with a result to the public and the suitors which may often be disastrous.

4. The introduction of a separate examination in Parliamentary practice is quite unnecessary and unadvisable. The subject is not sufficient to require such machinery. The "accurate acquaintance with particular branches of the law" required by the committee is best attained by the existing means—namely, the legal examination of the Incorporated Law Society—and it is a very simple course to authorise that body to add a division to the existing subjects, which shall comprise an examination in Parliamentary practice, and, if necessary, to make a special certificate for that department. Similar provisions might be made as to solicitors in Ireland and Scotland if thought necessary.

5. The power of striking off the roll, proposed by the report, is far too peremptory. For professional misconduct, of course, such a penalty should be duly applied—but judicially, and after a fair hearing—and proper provision should be made for that purpose. But "neglect of rules" is one of those wide phrases which may be seriously misapplied. The accidental omission to deposit an amended Bill in due time before committee is not a fault for which such a penalty should be possible; and the submission for taxation of an unduly large bill of costs (which Mr. Adam thinks—q. 200—should be visited with the same punishment) is surely an extraordinary ground for such a course. Again, the existence of contracts or arrangements between solicitors and agents as to division of profits—which is by par. 16 recommended to be made the subject of a rule (and for breach of which striking off the roll is therefore authorised)—is specially one of those matters for which, even if thought objectionable, an absolute prohibition to practise would be a most improper and excessive punishment.

6. The division of professional charges is one of those subjects which is specially a matter of freedom of contract. Excepting the imputations made by some of the witnesses as to dishonest conduct having arisen from it—which, however, is not supported by any single fact, nor even the quotation of an anonymous instance—this seems a matter which in no way affects the public or the clients. The real amendment wanted is the consolidation of the two scales of charges now authorised, and that amendment would be a benefit to the public generally as well as to the taxing masters.

In conclusion, I would only say that the main object of the committee—the ensuring a thoroughly trained, educated, and competent body of gentlemen as Parliamentary agents—is one which I warmly approve; but the recommendations of their report fail to attain the end they have in view, while the means they propose, which confirm and render permanent the exclusion of solicitors, as a body, from direct access to the officers of the House, and interpose a new and narrow profession between them and the promotion of Bills in Parliament, will, if adopted, produce injurious effects both to the legal profession and the public, which strenuous efforts should be made to avert.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

Inquiries, as to Students' Societies, as to the several Examinations, as to Admission on the Roll of the Supreme Court, as to being called to the Bar, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, should be addressed to the Editor (Students' Department).

At the Final Examinations held in the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society during 1876, two gentlemen, since admitted on the roll, especially distinguished themselves, as appears from the information published in our last issue (page 281). We refer to Mr. T. Bateman Napier, of Preston, who carried off one of the society's prizes last year, and who was also awarded the Atkinson gold medal and the Scott Scholarship, the latter open to all candidates; and to Mr. John Denby, jun., of Manchester, who took one of the society's prizes last year, and who also carried off the Broderip gold medal, open to all candidates, and was reported as having passed the best examination of any candidate from Manchester or Salford during 1876. Here, then, we have two solicitors who each carried off three separate honours at their Final Examination. The rewards take the form of reports, medals, and books. What solicitor can fail to regret that the Incorporated Law Society has no more substantial reward to offer to such students of the law? We venture to say that had these two gentlemen been students for the Bar their rewards would have been a small income for a fixed number of years in addition to the usual certificates. The Inns of Court cannot successfully defend their claim to the exclusive application of their accumulated wealth to promoting the study of the law by students for the Bar only. There would be little difficulty, we apprehend, in ascertaining approximately what sums have been paid into their exchequer by the solicitors' profession in times gone by, especially about the time of the reign of Queen Anne. But, apart from this consideration, it is impossible not to feel that the time has come when the solicitors' profession should make an united effort to found valuable scholarships and exhibitions for the purpose of encouraging the study of the law by men destined to enter their ranks. The whole subject deserves the serious attention of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society. They are really the masters of the situation now that they are the examiners, and the attendance of one of the common law masters at each Final Examination is simply a useless form, which ought to be dispensed with. Indeed, the examiners can hardly feel otherwise than that the presence of the common law taxing masters at the examinations in the society's hall is an intrusion. For what earthly reason is a taxing master placed over all the other examiners, and over the president of the society himself, when bills of costs are waiting to be taxed, and there is a large arrears of business at chambers.

The following lectures and classes are appointed to be delivered and held in the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, during the ensuing week: Monday, Conveyancing Class, 4.30 to 6 o'clock p.m.; Tuesday, ditto; the Wednesday class in Conveyancing has been discontinued, and gentlemen who have hitherto attended on that day should transfer themselves to the Monday or Tuesday class; Thursday, 1st March, lecture on Equity, 6 to 7 o'clock p.m. Subscribers are not admitted to the hall after lectures have commenced.

WHERE articles expire between the 9th April and 22nd May, candidates may be examined on the 24th and 25th April next; and if between the 21st May and 2nd Nov., may be examined on the 19th and 20th June next; or, of course, at any subsequent examination. Six weeks' notice at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of the month of examination.

In case of the death of a principal during articles, fresh articles should always be entered into without loss of time. The time which elapses between the day of the death of the principal and the day of the date of fresh articles being entered into, does not count, so that the further articles must be for a time sufficient to make up for this loss of service, as well as for the unexpired term of the original articles of clerkship.

THE remaining days appointed in 1877 for the Preliminary Examinations are Wednesday 16th and Thursday 17th May; Wednesday 11th and Thursday 12th July; Wednesday 24th and Thursday 25th October.

AN examination certificate is only available for admission on the roll of the Supreme Court within six months from its date, and must otherwise be specially enlarged by an order of the Master of the Rolls, which should be applied for at the Petty Bag Office.

NOTICES for the final examination, and notices for admission on the roll of solicitors can be renewed within one week from the end of the month, for which such original notices have respectively been given. For further information see the Regulations of November 1875 (third Schedule). We understand that the examiners consider that this only applies where articles of clerkship have expired. In this view we cannot, however, concur. The regulations in question do not seem to admit of any such restriction.

BARROW-IN-FURNES LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held in the Secretary's Office, 2, Lawson-street, on Wednesday evening, the 14th inst., Mr. J. H. Thompson in the chair. The subject for discussion was:—"A. leases to B. for years. The lease contains a covenant that B. shall not assign, without the licence of A; B. afterwards, without the licence of A, bequeaths the term by will and dies. That such a bequest is a forfeiture of lease." Mr. R. D. Duncan, supported by Messrs. Hommingway, H. Walker and Webber, argued for the affirmative, and Mr. J. C. Walker for the negative. No cases were cited on either side. It was argued for the affirmative that a devise by will was the voluntary act of the party, that leases usually contain clauses of exception where assignment by will is permitted, and its omission is by inference evidence of parties' intentions; that since 1845 deed necessary for a lease, that point not before courts since 1845, and that in Doc v. Bevan, Doc v. Evans, and other cases referred to in the law books the point was merely incidentally mentioned, and these cases occurred before deeds were necessary, and that covenants are construed strictly against covenantor. For the negative it was contended that a breach of covenant does not work a forfeiture of the lease, and no condition for re-entry appeared in the subject for discussion, that devise by will was an assignment by operation of law, and that courts of law lean always strongly against forfeitures. Mr. Duncan having replied, the affirmative was carried by a small majority.

BOLTON ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

THIS society held its fifth ordinary meeting on Wednesday, the 14th Feb. inst., at the Bolton Law Society's Rooms, Wood-street, when a large number of members attended. Mr. G. J. French was in the chair, and announced to the meeting that the society had been accepted into union with the United Law Students' Society, London, a piece of information which was received by the members with great satisfaction. A very entertaining essay on the "Feudal System" was then read by Mr. Pennington, after which Mr. Winstanley opened the question of the evening, "Is it desirable to Abolish Capital Punishment?" in the affirmative, and was supported by Mr. Cullen. Mr. Chambers and Mr. P. Watkins ably opposed them, and an animated discussion on the point ensued, Mr. Cooper speaking on the affirmative, and Messrs. Pennington, Gee, and others on the negative side of the debate. After the chairman had summed up, the question was put to the meeting, and was decided in the negative by a majority of six.

BRISTOL LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held in the Law Library, Small-street, Bristol, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 20. The chair was taken by E. A. Harley, Esq., solicitor, and the following subject was discussed:—"A. and B. are the owners of two adjoining houses. A. takes his down, and for the purposes of rebuilding makes such excavations as reasonably cause B. to fear for his house, which he 'ties up.' Is A. liable for the expenses of such 'tying up'?" The affirmative was opened by Mr. Jacques, seconded by Mr. Strachan, and the negative by Mr. Blake, seconded by Mr. Foster. Messrs. Moreby, Pease, and Carpenter also joined in the debate. On the question being put to the meeting the affirmative was carried by a majority of two. A vote of thanks to the chairman was passed. Mr. T. C. Caparn retired from the committee, and was thanked for his services to the society.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS SOCIETY.

A GENERAL meeting of this society was held at the County Court House, Queen-street, on Monday evening last, Mr. James Yeoman in the chair. After the transaction of some preliminary business, the chairman explained the provisions of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of last session, showing the constitution of the Court of Final Appeal, the power to create life peers as lords of appeal in ordinary, the power to enable the court to sit during the prorogation or dissolution of Parliament, the provisions for the gradual merger of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the power to enable actions and proceedings to be disposed of by a single judge of the High Court, and the limitation of the wide powers of appeal conferred by the Act of 1873. Mr. Hastings summarised the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876, explaining the different natures of the pollutions provided against, the powers entrusted in the hands of sanitary authorities exercisable under the control of the Local Government Board to carry into effect the reforms contemplated by the statute, and the jurisdiction conferred upon County Courts to restrain persons from the commission of offences against the Act. Mr. Piercy sketched out the main provisions of the Elementary Education Act 1876, touching upon the declaration contained in the Act as to the duty of every parent to see to the education of his child, the provisions regulating the employment of children in factories, the payment of school fees for poor parents, the provisions relating to industrial schools, and to wastrel children, the powers given to poor law guardians and town councils, where no school boards exist, to enforce some of the provisions of the Education Acts, and the powers for the dissolution of boards under certain circumstances. An interesting discussion took place on each statute.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

AT a meeting of this society, held at the Law Institution on Tuesday last, Mr. S. Garrett, B.A. in the chair, the subject for discussion was as follows:—"A testator directs the trustees under his will to lay out a sum of money in the purchase of an annuity for A., with a limitation over in favour of his residuary estate on certain events happening: have the residuary legatees any right to enforce the limitation over in their favour on certain events happening?" Mr. Robinson opened the debate in the affirmative, the negative being sustained by Mr. Harris and Mr. G. H. Bowen. After a lengthy discussion the chairman summed up, and the votes being equal the point was decided by his casting in the negative. Eighteen members were present. The subject for discussion on Tuesday next is as follows:—"Should the Gothenburg system for regulating the liquor traffic be introduced into England?"

LEICESTER LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

THE tenth meeting of this society for the session 1876-77 took place in the Law Library, Friar-lane, Leicester, on the 14th instant, G. H. Blunt, Esq., in the chair. The question for discussion was, "That the codification of our Corpus Juris is desirable and practicable." Mr. Chamberlain opened the debate in the affirmative, and was followed by Mr. Green and Mr. Hinks in the negative, and Mr. Browning, Mr. Harvey, and Mr. Dickinson in the affirmative. The chairman summed up, and the question being put to the vote the result was a tie, whereupon the chairman gave his casting vote in the negative.

LIVERPOOL LAW STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION.

THE fourth meeting of this association was held on Monday, the 19th inst., at the Law Library, Cook-street, F. M. Hull, Esq., B.A., in the chair. After the transaction of the formal business the chairman called upon Mr. Crossfield to open the debate in the affirmative on the following question:—"Is the separate estate of a married woman liable on a quasi contract, e. g., for the repayment of money paid to her by mistake, or on a consideration which has wholly failed?" Mr. G. L. Collins followed in the negative, after which a discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Algar, C. H. Collins, Thompson, Melhuish, Lightbound, Rogers, and Broadbridge took part. Mr. Crossfield having replied the question was put to the meeting, and decided in the affirmative by a majority of six. There were twenty-two members present.

MANCHESTER LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

THE seventh ordinary meeting of this session was held at Cross-street Chambers on the 13th Feb. last. James Cottingham, Esq., B.A., Barrister-at-Law, occupied the chair. The following members were present: Messrs. Harwood, Jas. Simpson, Flower, Higham, W. Slater, Miller, Ellis, Atkins, Wilde, E. Hewit, Hampson, Etheredge, Nadin, and the secretary. The following was the subject for discussion:—"If in ignorance that the debtor secretly carries on a trade, the sheriff pays over the proceeds of sale under an execution to the execution creditor, and afterwards, but within fourteen days of the sale is served with a notice of a petition, upon which an adjudication is made, is the sheriff liable to the trustee for the amount so paid over?" (Bankruptcy Act 1869, sect. 87; Ex parte Spooner, re Smith, L. Rep. 10 Ch. 168. Compare Norton v. Walker, 18 L. J. 234, Ex.; Lloyd v. Harrison, 35 L. J. 153, Q.B.) On the suggestion of the learned chairman the question was amplified by adding thereto the fact of a regular seizure and sale having previously taken place, and that the execution was levied for a sum exceeding £50. In the absence of Messrs. Berry and Eaton the chief speakers appointed in the affirmative, the secretary opened the proceedings, and insisted upon the sheriff's liability, upon the ground that there is no clause in sect. 87 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, giving the sheriff immunity for all acts done by him thereunder, whereas there was such a saving clause in sect. 73 of the Act of 1861. Mr. Harwood pleaded the cause of the negative, remarking on the hardship which such a liability as that in question would produce, and quoting the case of Ex parte Villars, re Rogers (L. Rep. Ch. App.), in which, under somewhat similar circumstances, the sheriff was held not liable. Mr. Higham followed in the affirmative, and dealt with Mr. Justice Erle's judgment in the case of Lloyd v. Harrison. Mr. Hewit, on behalf of the negative, submitted that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the sheriff would be cognizant of the circumstances of every person within his bailiwick. Mr. Etheridge and Mr. Hampson then addressed the meeting, the former in the affirmative and the latter in the negative. Mr. Simpson contended that the decision in Balme v. Hutton (9 Bing. 471), was an authority in favour of the affirmative; and Mr. Ellis remarked upon the relation back of the act of bankruptcy. Messrs. Flower and Nadin also spoke, and the secretary replied, whereupon the chairman summed up, showing the precise application of Ex parte Villars and its bearing upon the point at issue. He considered the argument that at the time of payment the proceeds were the property of the trustee irresistible, and that the sheriff in not holding such proceeds for fourteen days, but parting with them before he was bound to do so, had rendered himself liable as he (the chairman) was not aware of any law compelling the sheriff to pay over the proceeds to the execution creditor within the period of fourteen days. On being put to the meeting the affirmative view was adopted nem. con.

Mr. Millar proposed and Mr. Ellis seconded a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was carried by acclamation and appropriately acknowledged.

NOTTINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

The annual dinner of this society was held on Friday evening, the 9th Feb., 1877, at the Flying Horse Hotel, Nottingham. The chair was taken by W. A. Richards, Esq., solicitor (in the absence of the president, S. G. Johnson, Esq.), and the vice-chair by Arthur Williams, Esq., solicitor. There were also present about thirty members of the society and several visitors.

The chairman proposed the toasts of "The Queen and Royal Family," and "The Army, Navy, and Reserve Forces," the latter being responded to by Sergeant Black (a solicitor), of the Robin Hood Rifles.

The secretary then read the report of the committee for the session ending December 1876, which pressure on our space necessitates our holding over.

A statement of the treasurer's accounts was also presented, which showed that the financial position of the society was satisfactory.

The chairman proposed "The Nottingham Law Students' Society," congratulating it on its present prosperity, and wishing it every success. The toast was drunk with enthusiasm, and the vice-president of the society, Mr. C. L. Rothera, B.A., replied, hoping that all articulated clerks in the town would become members, and that the solicitors would give their support.

The remaining toasts were "The Mayor and Corporation of Nottingham," proposed by Mr. Williams, and responded to by Mr. Councillor Fraser; "The Legal Profession," proposed by Mr. J. Hodgson, and responded to by Mr. C. Butlin; "The Visitors," proposed by Mr. P. Woodward, and responded to by Messrs. J. M. Perry and A. F. Kirby; and "The Ladies," proposed by Mr. W. H. Stevenson, and responded to by Mr. D. Whittingham.

Several songs and a recitation were given, and the proceedings, which had throughout been of an enjoyable character, terminated.

THE DUBLIN LAW CLERKS' ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting was held last Monday evening, at the offices, 207, Great Brunswick-street. The attendance, which was comparatively small, included Messrs. Segrave, Crowley, Dodd, M'Namara, Flynn, Adams, Devereux, and Sheridan. The chair was taken by Mr. M'Namara, who had been for the sixth time re-elected president. The treasurer announced the receipt of annual subscriptions of £1 1s. each from John Mathews, Esq., P. J. Kelly, Esq., and T. Coolough, Esq. A vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. Crowley, and seconded by Mr. Sheridan, was unanimously accorded to these gentlemen. The President moved the adoption of the report (which, owing to pressure on our space, we are unable to print in extenso, but a resume of which has already appeared), and concluded by exhorting the incoming committee to work sedulously for the interests of the association during their year of office, so that at the end of their term some real work could be shown to have been accomplished and some real progress made. Mr. Devereux seconded the adoption of the report. The association was out of debt and had a large balance in hand, and there had been a slight increase in the number of paid-up members. He did not concur in everything in the report, but there were tangible signs of improvement. Mr. Segrave supported the motion, and urged the new committee to institute lessons in conveyancing and in the principles of equity. Unless the law clerks of the future mastered the elements of these subjects they would be pushed aside in the competition for the superior clerkships by the junior solicitors who were now becoming law clerks in such steadily increasing numbers. The report was then declared carried.—Irish Law Times.

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

At the weekly meeting held at Clement's Inn Hall, Strand, on Wednesday, the 21st inst. The subject for discussion was, "That trading on Sunday should be allowed." The Hon. Sec., Mr. Rubinstein, opened the debate in a speech of some length, pointing out the inconsistency of the various statutes at present in existence upon the subject, and calling attention to the want of occupation and amusement for the masses of the people upon their only holiday in the week. An interesting debate, in which many of the members joined, ensued, the motion being ultimately lost by eight votes. The subject for next Wednesday's meeting is, "That the law and custom of primogeniture is contrary to public policy." The members down to support the motion are Messrs. P. Thornton and T. D. Stevens; to oppose Messrs. W. C. Owen and E. Hickson.

WOLVERHAMPTON LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

The general annual meeting of this society was held in the Law Library, Darlington-street, on Friday, the 9th inst. Among those present were Mr. F. T. Langley (in the chair), Messrs. Andrews, Barber, Bayley, Chesdale, W. J. Dent, Cresswell, Howl, Lawrence, Manby, Page, and A. B. Smith. The reports of the committee and treasurer were read and adopted. From the former it appeared that the society now numbers seventy-three members, and that there have been held sixteen ordinary meetings of a very successful character during the year. The treasurer's report showed a considerable balance in hand. The following gentlemen were then elected as the committee for the present year: Messrs. Barber, Cresswell, Dent, Lawrence, Page, A. B. Smith, and A. Whitehouse; Mr. Cresswell was re-elected honorary secretary, and Mr. Dent honorary treasurer. A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the proceedings. The first annual dinner of the society took place at the Star and Garter Hotel, Victoria-street, on Tuesday, the 13th inst. There was a large assemblage of honorary and ordinary members of the society. Mr. Henry Underhill (town clerk) presided, and Mr. John Neve occupied the vice chair. After the usual loyal and patriotic toasts, Mr. Lawrence proposed "The Legal Profession," which was responded to by Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Thorne. The chairman, in proposing next the toast of the evening, "The Wolverhampton Law Students' Society," said it gave him great pleasure to preside over a meeting of the young students of the law such as the present, and he proceeded to remark upon the usefulness of the society, and the advantages it afforded to its members. The toast, which was drunk with enthusiasm, was responded to by Mr. A. B. Smith and Mr. Barber. The Vice-Chairman, in an appropriate speech, next proposed "The Officers of the Society," which was responded to by Mr. Cresswell. The healths of the chairman and vice-chairman, proposed by Mr. Brevitt and Mr. Page, were then heartily drunk, and the proceedings brought to a close.

SEWERS—POWER OF LOCAL AUTHORITY.—WHAT IS A "STREET?"—The term "street" both in its general meaning, and by the Oldham Borough Improvement Act 1865 (Acts Local and Personal, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 311), includes a private road, for passage over which a toll is charged, and over which the public have no right of way. The plaintiff was the owner of a private road at Oldham, and set up a toll bar at one end, and charged tolls for passengers. The defendants, without any further notice than the erection of a board with a printed notice thereon, proceeded to dig and construct sewers in the said road. The plaintiff moved for an injunction to restrain them from proceeding with the work. Motion refused. Held, that the corporation was empowered to construct such sewers, both under sect. 4 of the Utilisation of Sewage Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 75), s. 16, and the Public Health Act 1875 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 55), and by their Private Act. The special rights and powers given by a Private Act of Parliament are not taken away by the general provisions of a Public Act: (Taylor v. The Corporation of Oldham, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686. ##### NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

ADMINISTRATION SUIT—PARTIAL DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE—EXECUTORS' MISTAKE—COSTS.—A testator by his will gave his residuary estate to his executors upon trust to divide the same equally among his grandchildren on their respectively attaining twenty-one. There were six grandchildren, but the executors mistakenly supposing one grandchild not to be entitled under the will, divided the residue into five shares, paid to four of the grandchildren their shares, and retained one share for the fifth grandchild, the plaintiff, who, on attaining twenty-one, filed a bill for the administration of the testator's estate. A decree was made declaring that the sixth grandchild was entitled to a share of the residue, and on taking the accounts it was found that the executors had applied part of the residue in the repair of houses specifically devised, and that a larger sum was due from them than they had admitted, and that the four grandchildren who had received their shares had been overpaid. Held, that the costs of the administration suit ought to be paid out of the whole estate, as if no distribution had taken place, so as to charge the executors with the share of costs attributable to the distributed shares: (Hilliard v. Fulford, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 750. Chanc. Div.)

WINDING-UP—PRACTICE—TIME FOR APPEALING—Order LVIII., rule 9, provides that "the time for appealing from any order or decision made or given in the matter of the winding-up of a company, under the Provision of the Companies Act 1862, or any Act amending the same, or any order or decision made in the matter of any bankruptcy, or in any other matter not being an action, shall be the same as the time limited for appeal from an interlocutory order under rule 15." Rule 15 fixes the limit of twenty-one days for bringing an appeal from an interlocutory order. Held, that under rule 9 an appeal from an order to wind-up a company ought to be brought within twenty-one days: (The National Funds Association Co., 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 689. Ct. of App.)

NOTES OF NEW DECISIONS.

BANKER'S DEPOSIT NOTES—CHANGE IN FIRM, AND DEATH OF FORMER PARTNER—PAYMENT OF INTEREST BY NEW FIRM—RELEASE OF FORMER PARTNER.—A firm of bankers was in the habit of receiving money on deposit, paying interest thereon, and giving deposit notes. Whenever a change was made, either by additional payments or by drawings out, in the amount of the deposit, the old deposit note was given up, and a new one given for the new balance. In 1872 two new partners were taken into the firm. One of the original partners died in the same year, the other original partner died in 1874. The business was carried on by the new partners alone until 1875, when the bank stopped payment. The firm continued to receive money on deposit, giving notes as before, such notes bearing the same signature as those issued by the original partnership. The new firm also paid, or credited, interest to the depositors until the bank failed. After the failure the depositors carried in proofs against the estates of the bankrupt partners, and then sought to prove for the balance against the estate of an original partner. Held, that the depositors had by their acts accepted the liability of the new partners in lieu of that of the old partners, and that the latter were consequently released: (Billborough v. Holmes, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 759. Chanc. Div.)

LEGAL NEWS.

THE judge of the Ilkeston County Court has censured two bailiffs for having handcuffed prisoners for debt on their way to prison, and threatened to discharge them on a repetition of the offence.

ILLNESS OF CHIEF BARON PALLES.—The Chief Baron of the Irish Court of Exchequer is stated to be suffering from an attack of scarlet fever, induced, it is said, by the unhealthy condition of the Exchequer Court.

THE very latest and most ridiculous case of the "insanity plea" has occurred in San Francisco, where one of a gang of professional bondsmen, indicted and tried for furnishing "straw bail," pleaded insanity as a reason for signing a 1000 dol. bond, and swearing that he was worth 6000 dol.

THE FOLKESTONE RITUAL APPEAL.—No day has been appointed up to the present time by the judicial committee of the Privy Council to give judgment in the Folkestone ritual case, and as two of the ten judges have proceeded on circuit, it is probable that the judgment will not be given until after the Easter recess.

A BANKRUPTCY TRUSTEE SENT TO GAOL.—An auctioneer, of Dartmouth, called Widdicombe, was trustee of the estate of a farmer named Bond. He had neglected to file the accounts, his excuse being that the committee of inspection would not sign them. This, it appears, was because, as they said, he had not done his duty in getting in the bankruptcy estate; and the judge, Mr. Fortescue, on Wednesday sent him to gaol until he should purge himself of his contempt.

THE Dublin correspondent of the Times says, on Wednesday: "The observations of the Lord Justice of Appeal upon the Vice-Chancellor yesterday, and upon other occasions, have excited a strong feeling of dissatisfaction among the members of the Bar, and a requisition has been signed by a large number of Queen's Counsel and other barristers, requesting the father of the Bar to convene a meeting to be held on Saturday next for the purpose of considering the language and observations of the Lord Justice Christian in several recent cases, and especially in King v. Anderson, and to consider whether such language and observations are calculated to affect the administration of justice and the profession of the Bar."

THE Right Hon. Edward Gibson, A.M., Q.C., M.P., her Majesty's Attorney-General for Ireland, was, on the 15th inst., sworn a member of the Privy Council in Ireland, and assumed his seat at the board accordingly. Mr. Gibson is the second son of Mr. William Gibson, formerly Taxing-Master of the Court of Chancery. He was born in 1837, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. in 1858, and M.A. in 1861. He was called to the Bar in Hilary Term 1860, and joined the Leinster Circuit. In July 1872, he was called to the inner Bar. He was elected M.P. for the University of Dublin, in the Conservative interest, in January 1875. On the elevation of the Right Hon. George A. C. May to the Chief Justiceship of Ireland, Mr. Gibson was appointed Attorney-General, and his seat for the University of Dublin having thereupon become vacant, he was, on Feb. 13th, inst., re-elected M.P. for that constituency, without opposition.—Irish Law Times.

Liquidation.

HIS HONOUR.—This is an application by the trustee to expunge a proof for £3000, made by W. Braithwaite, which the trustee had previously admitted. The application is made under rule 73, in pursuance of leave given by the court under the special circumstances of this case. The facts are as follows:—The debtor, John Yewdale, carried on the business of a woollen manufacturer, at Rawson and Leeds, and for some time prior and up to Oct. 1870, kept his banking account with Messrs. Beckett and Co., of Leeds, who had allowed him a limited overdraft. This overdraft he had availed himself of, and in Oct. 1870, he wanted, for the purposes of his business, a further advance of £3000, which Messrs. Beckett refused to allow him to draw for. He then applied to his father-in-law, Samuel Atkinson, to become security to the bankers for £3000, to be advanced to the debtor, he agreeing to give Atkinson counter security. Thereupon Atkinson had an interview with Mr. W. D. Beckett, one of the partners in the banking firm, and agreed to give them his promissory note for £3000, payable to their order three months after date, and to deposit with them certificates for £5000 South-Eastern Railway Stock, as security upon the bank crediting the debtor's drawing account with £3000. This arrangement was assented to and duly completed. The promissory note was given, and the railway certificates were delivered to the bankers, and the debtor's account was credited with the £3000, and he drew upon it accordingly to the full amount of the £3000. At the same time it was arranged by Atkinson and the bankers that if the debtor should not have reduced his account by £3000 by the time the note arrived at maturity Atkinson should take it up, and if the amount was so reduced, the note and railway certificates should be given up. This arrangement was completed on the 27th Oct. 1870, and by a deed dated the same day, and made between the debtor of the one part, and Atkinson of the other, and duly executed by the debtor, after reciting that Atkinson had, at the request of the debtor, now advanced to him the sum of £3000 for security, for which sum the debtor had that day given Atkinson his promissory note, payable three months after demand, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum, and had agreed to execute such further security, as thereafter contained. The deed then contained a covenant by the debtor with Atkinson that he would pay the £3000 to Atkinson on the 27th of Jan. next, with interest thereon in the meantime, without deduction; and also if the £3000 should remain unpaid after the 27th Jan. next, to pay interest at 5 per cent., by half-yearly payments, on the 27th Jan. and 27th Oct. in every year, so long as the £3000 remained unpaid. And by the same deed, by way of further security, the debtor assigned to Atkinson a policy on his (the debtor's) life, granted by the Provident Life Insurance Company, dated 16th Dec. 1868, No. 26,051, for £8000, at an annual premium of £364 6s. 8d., and all bonuses thereon, with the usual provision for enabling Atkinson to receive the moneys due on the policy if they became due, or to sell the policy, and out of the moneys so to be received, to repay himself the £3000, and interest and costs, and pay any surplus to the debtor, and the debtor covenanted in the meantime to pay the premiums and keep up the policy. The debtor did not reduce his banking account by the 27th Jan. 1871, and Atkinson did not pay his note to the bank, and the bankers allowed matters to remain as they were until the 13th April 1872, the debtor having in the meantime kept down the interest on the £3000. On that day the bankers required Atkinson to pay them the £3000. It was not convenient to Atkinson to do so, and the debtor was unable to pay the money. It appears that Atkinson then consulted his solicitor, the late Mr. Dibb, who promised to advance him the £3000 out of moneys which he and his partner, Mr. Braithwaite, held on a joint account, to enable him to pay his promissory note to the bankers on receiving from them the £5000 railway stock, and the joint and several promissory notes of the debtor and Atkinson for £3000, payable on demand, leaving the mortgage of the policy in the possession of Atkinson as a counter security to him. This arrangement was carried out. The £3000 was advanced by Dibb and Braithwaite, and applied in paying Atkinson's note to the bankers, who thereupon delivered up the railway certificates to Dibb and Atkinson, and the debtor and Atkinson signed and delivered their joint and several promissory notes, dated 30th April 1870, for £3000, payable on demand to them, or the survivor, or their or his order, with interest at

5 per cent. per annum in the meantime, payable half-yearly. The mortgage deed and policy remained in the possession of Atkinson; interest on the £3000 was duly paid by the debtor from April 1872, up to the half-yearly day of payment preceding the filing his petition. This petition was filed on the 29th Jan. 1876. Dibb having died in the meantime, Braithwaite, as the survivor, on the 30th May 1876, tendered his proof for £3000, the only consideration stated being the joint and several note for £3000, signed by the debtor and Atkinson, a copy of which note was inserted in the proof. This proof was admitted by the trustee. Atkinson did not tender any proof, and the trustee was prepared to pay Braithwaite the dividend on the £3000, but required Atkinson to give up to the trustee the policy for £8000. This Atkinson refused to do, insisting that he had a right to retain it for the purpose of recouping himself whatever sum he might be called upon to pay Braithwaite, to make good the £3000 and interest, after having had credit for the dividend he should receive on his proof; but he should not tender any proof upon the estate, nor has he done so. Under these circumstances, the trustee on the 1st Nov. 1876, gave notice of motion for an order restraining Atkinson from selling or otherwise dealing with or surrendering the life policy of £8000, and for an order directing him to give up the policy, and also the debtor's note for £3000, dated 27th Oct. 1870, to the trustee, and to release the mortgage of the same date. This motion was heard before me on the 22nd Nov., and I directed the motion to stand over till the 6th Dec. next, with liberty for the trustee to take such proceedings as he might be advised for expunging Braithwaite's proof. On the 6th Dec. the further hearing was by consent adjourned to the 20th Dec. On the 15th Dec. the trustee, instead of moving to expunge the proof under the liberty given by the order of the 22nd Nov., gave Braithwaite notice that he rejected the proof. On the 20th Dec. the original motion came on again, and it was ordered that the trustee do withdraw his notice, dated the 15th Dec. 1876, of his rejection of Braithwaite's proof, and be at liberty to apply to the court to consider the propriety of expunging this proof. And, further, that the trustee do pay to the Provident Institution the premium then due on the policy, and also pay Atkinson costs of the application up to and including the costs of that day; and further, the trustee undertaking to abide by any order the court may think fit to make as to costs or damages in case the court should be of opinion that Atkinson shall have incurred or sustained any costs or damages by nature of that order, that Atkinson be restrained from selling or otherwise dealing with or surrendering the policy until the 11th Jan. next, and that the further hearing of the original motion stand over until the 10th Jan. next. On the 5th Jan. the trustee served a notice on Atkinson for the 10th Jan. to consider the propriety of expunging the proof of the 30th May 1876, and to order accordingly. Both motions came on to be heard before me on the 10th Jan. last, and were argued by counsel on both sides. On behalf of the trustee it was contended that there was only one debt of £3000, for which proof could be made against the estate of the debtor. That if Braithwaite's proof were allowed to remain, the estate would have paid the debt, and the policy must be given up by Atkinson, or that Braithwaite's proof must be expunged for want of consideration as between the payee and the debtor. On the part of Atkinson it was contended that, as he held the policy for valuable consideration given by him to the debtor, and he had not come in to prove against the estate, he was entitled to retain his security unless the trustee redeemed it by paying him his debt in full. I was of opinion, upon the hearing of the original motion, that the court had no power to take the policy out of the hand of Atkinson and hand it to the trustee, except upon the terms of paying Atkinson in full, he not having come in under the liquidation. I was of opinion he was, as regarded the right to retain the policy, in the position of a secured creditor, whose rights are regulated by the 40th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869. I shall, therefore, dismiss the original motion of the trustee, so far as relates to the delivery of the policy by Atkinson to him, with costs, and regard will be had to the costs already ordered to be paid. As to the other motion by the trustee, that Braithwaite's proof for £3000 may be expunged, the argument in support of the motion was that unless the estate could have the benefit of the policy in reduction of the debt, the rule against double proof would be infringed; and that, as between the debtor and Braithwaite, treating the transaction between them as distinct from the debt for £3000 due from the debtor to Atkinson, for which Atkinson held the policy as security, there was no consideration given by Braithwaite to the debtor or received by him from Braithwaite for the debtor's signature to the note, on which alone Braithwaite's proof was made. The answer given to this argument was that, as the debtor was, as between himself and the bankers, the original debtor for the £3000, and Atkinson was, as between himself and the debtor, only the debtor's surety; when the bankers called upon Atkinson to pay the £3000 it was the debtor's duty to have found that sum in cash; and as he was not able to do so, the advance of £3000 by Dibb and Braithwaite to Atkinson was really an advance by them to the debtor—it was, in substance, money paid by them to his use and at his request. It might be a sufficient reply to this contention to notice that the proof does not profess to be founded upon any such consideration. The consideration stated in the proof is simply the liability arising from the debtor's signature, and, in my opinion, the proof as it stands states the consideration correctly both in law and in fact. To treat the £3000 not as a loan to Atkinson from Dibb and Braithwaite, for which he was their principal debtor, but as a loan by them to the debtor; treating Atkinson merely as the surety for their advance would be a simple fiction invented for the purpose of evading the rule in bankruptcy against double proof. If the advance of the £3000 by Dibb and Atkinson was a loan by them to the debtor as principal, why did they not protect themselves as against the debtor by requiring the transfer of the policy to them. The answer simply is this, that the loan by them was to Atkinson as principal, and they took from him specific securities which they considered, and which doubtless were and are, ample, and which they still hold as the security on which they rely. Having come to the conclusion that I am bound to leave the policy in the possession of Atkinson, I think the answer given by Mr. West, as representing Atkinson, to my question upon what terms he insisted the trustee must redeem was correct, namely, only on the terms of paying Atkinson in full. Inferentially, that answer appears to me to involve the admission that, as between the debtor and Atkinson, the debtor is the principal debtor, and Atkinson all through has been—and now insists upon retaining all the rights of—a principal creditor. In my opinion, therefore, in whatever light this case is viewed, there being only one debt of £3000 to be paid out of the debtor's estate, and for which specific security has been given by the debtor, if proof is made in respect of that debt, the security for it must either be given up or valued at the value deducted from the proof, so that the trustee may exercise the right of redeeming the policy at that value. If that be not done then I must treat Braithwaite's proof as founded upon a note given by the debtor without consideration moving from or to either party to or from the other, and must, therefore, be expunged: (See Byles on Bills, p. 125, 10th edit., as to what constitutes consideration.) Consideration is, in general, either some detriment to the plaintiff sustained for the sake or at the instance of the defendant, or some benefit to the defendant moving from the plaintiff. Here the money was advanced to Atkinson to enable him to pay off his note to the bankers, and not in any real or direct sense for the sake or at the instance of the debtor, nor did any benefit accrue to the debtor moving from the plaintiff. In answer to the argument that the debtor was bound to find cash to enable Atkinson to pay the bank, it must be remembered that the note given to Dibb and Braithwaite was payable on demand, and payment might have been demanded the next day and the debtor still remained liable immediately to be sued by Atkinson on his overdue note of 27th Oct. 1872, and on his covenant to pay in the mortgage deed of the same date. I may observe that the transactions, as they were completed between Messrs. Dibb and Braithwaite, and the debtor and Atkinson, were in all respects correct as between solvent persons, and, I may add, proper for the protection of Atkinson as the client of Braithwaite; and I regard the proof by Braithwaite as really made for the benefit and protection of his client. But the subsequent insolvency of the debtor and the creditor's right to have his estate administered according to the rules in bankruptcy has brought into play a rule intended for the benefit of unsecured creditors with a view to the equal distribution among them of the unpledged assets of an insolvent debtor, a rule which would have had no application to the transactions between the parties so long as the debtor remained solvent. There will be one order upon all the motions and all the affidavits, and the former orders will be referred to in the order to be now made, and that order will be to dismiss the motion by the trustee for the delivery up of the policy by Atkinson to him with costs, to be paid by the trustee, regard being had to the costs already ordered to be paid. And upon the other motion by the trustee the order will be that the proof of the debt for £3000 made by Braithwaite on the 30th April 1876, be expunged with costs, and be paid by Braithwaite to the trustee, unless Braithwaite on or before the 10th Aug. next, or such other day as the court, on the application of either of the parties, shall fix, arrange, with Atkinson, to value the said policy and offer to deduct such value from his proof for £3000 so as to give the trustee the power, if he thinks proper, of redeeming the said policy at such value. And if the said policy is so valued, and the value deducted, then the trustee to pay Braithwaite the cost of the motion to expunge. And as the trustee has paid the last year's premium on the policy amounting to £364 6s. 8d., this order will continue the order of the 20th Dec. last, so far as it restrained Atkinson from selling or otherwise dealing with or surrendering the said policy, until the 11th Aug. next, or such other day as this court, upon the application of either of the parties, shall fix, the trustee continuing his undertaking as to damages contained in the said order of the 20th Dec. last. I may observe that the debtor, in his list of creditors, inserted Atkinson as a secured creditor, and did not include or make any reference to Dibb, and Braithwaite as creditors.

PRACTICE—BANKRUPTCY RULES 1870, SCHEDULE NO. 40—TRUSTEE'S BOND—ENFORCEMENT OF.—The introduction of the name of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy in the bond given by a trustee and his surety as specified in Form 40 in the Schedule to the Bankruptcy Rules 1870, is a mere matter of form; and the bond, when required, can be enforced in the County Court without application to the Chief Judge: (Re Parry, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768. Bank.)

PROOF—LOAN FOR PURPOSES OF BUSINESS—BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT ACT 1865.—In 1857 A., a trader, went through the ceremony of marriage with his deceased wife's sister. In 1858 she became entitled to a legacy of £3000, which was by her direction paid to A., upon the understanding that he should whenever called upon execute a proper settlement thereof upon her. No settlement was ever executed. In 1876 he filed a liquidation petition. Held, that no proof could be admitted against the estate until all the trade creditors had been paid in full: (Ex parte Corbridge, re Beale, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S., 768. Bank.)

HIRE OF FURNITURE—CUSTOM—BANKRUPTCY ACT—ORDER AND DISPOSITION.—On reading the last issue of the LAW TIMES, page 271, I observe the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy has decided that as yet no custom for letting furniture on hire sufficient to defeat the order and disposition clause of the Bankruptcy Act has been proved. Now, I think, there must have been a miscarriage herein, inasmuch as last year I had a similar case on behalf of a furniture dealer in the London Bankruptcy Court, in which I succeeded, and in support of our client's contention we referred to the case of Ex parte Powell, re Matthews, in which the same question arose, when Bacon, C.J. held that the custom of hiring furniture in this way had been so frequently proved that the court would take judicial notice of it, and the trustee, therefore, was not entitled. The trustee appealed, and the Court of Appeal, constituted by James and Mellish, L.J.J. Baggallay and Brett, J.J. Dec. 15. Their Lordships refused to disturb the Chief Judge's decision. Mr. Winslow and Mr. Yate Lee were counsel for the trustee appellant; Mr. Little, with Mr. Bagley, for the respondent. The Law Journal, in Notes on Cases, under date 25th Dec. 1875, page 194, reports the above.

THE BILL FOR THE PAYMENT OF JUSTICES' CLERKS BY SALARY INSTEAD OF FEES.—Many of your readers are doubtless acquainted with the outline of the Bill above-mentioned, which has been introduced into the House of Commons by Sir Henry Selwin Ibbetson, the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department. I perfectly agree with the principle of paying justices' clerks by salary instead of fees for the reasons given by the Under Secretary. But I strongly contend that the amount of such salary ought not to be arbitrarily fixed by the local authority subject to approval, but should be based upon the average amount of fees actually earned during, say, the three or five years prior to such salary being fixed. This would satisfy all justices' clerks, and would be just and equitable. There are many cases, however, where the salary is very much less than the amount of fees earned, and where the justices' clerk has, notwithstanding this, to find office, clerks, forms, &c., out of such salary.

The result is that the county or borough in some cases makes a considerable profit out of the fees earned by the justices' clerk. To remedy this unfair and anomalous state of things, I would suggest that the Bill should contain: 1. A clause for re-adjusting the salaries of clerks already appointed, as well as in framing the salaries of clerks hereafter to be appointed upon the basis of the average amount of fees earned in the three or five previous years. 2. A clause giving the Home Secretary the power of finally deciding the amount of salary in case of difference between the justices and local authority, or in case any justices' clerk thinks himself aggrieved and appeals to the Home Secretary to fix the amount. This would be in accordance with the spirit of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 9, which gives power to the Home Secretary to vary the amount of salary for the time being payable. Sect. 5 proposes to enact that a justice's clerk shall be either a solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature or have served for not less than seven years as a clerk to a police or stipendiary magistrate, or to a metropolitan police court, or have served for not less than seven years as or as assistant to either a clerk of a petty sessional division or a clerk to the justices of a borough, or (in the case of service before the passing of the Act) a clerk of special or petty sessions, or a clerk of a justice or justices of the peace. I strongly contend in all cases that a justice's clerk should be a solicitor. I venture to think that sect. 6 of the new Bill giving power to the local authority or Secretary of State to adjust and alter any table of fees in proportion to the salary of the clerk is an entire mistake. The enactment ought to be the reverse of this. When a considerable discrepancy arises between the amount of the fees and the salary, it clearly shows that the salary is too low in proportion to the work done, which is represented by the fees earned. In such a case, I submit, the salary should be raised instead of the fees being lowered. A long experience enables me to say very confidently that nothing conduces so much to frivolous cases and charges made from improper and malicious motives as too low a table of fees. I think, too, that a uniform table of fees ought to be fixed by statute, and be in operation throughout the country, and the proposed enactment would interfere with any such uniformity. "READING FOR HONOURS."—Are you not tired of this ridiculous expression? Where, as at many university examinations, there is a separate set of subjects and a separate set of questions for a candidate for honours, it is possible to read for them. Such examinations are entirely different in their object to the solicitor's admission examination. They are to mark a man's general attainments. This is to ascertain his qualification for a specific profession. "Reading for honours," if it means anything, implies the possibility of "reading for a pass," and that must mean, in plain English, reading as little as may enable a man to scramble through. A man who will make up his mind to this is clearly unfit for any profession, or indeed, for any honourable pursuit. The only object of reading is to qualify oneself to fulfil the duties it is desired to undertake, and the object of the examination is to ascertain if that has been done. That artful clerk who will think least about either a pass or honours, but will devote himself most thoroughly by work as well as by reading to fit himself for professional practice, is the most likely to be entitled to subscribe himself also. When a woman married in "manu mariti" there were 3 ways of the marriage being performed, by Confarreatio, Coemptio, and Usus; and the bride's dos was also of 3 kinds, Profectitia, Adventitia, and Receptitia. There were 3 ways of rendering natural children legitimate, Per subsequens matrimonium, per oblationem curiæ, and per rescriptum principis. There were 3 kinds of Tutors Testamentary, Tutors in Law, and Tutors dative. We find Corporations were constituted in 3 ways, by Public Authority, by a Senatus Consultum, and by Imperial Constitution. Property, too, was acquired in 3 ways, by Occupancy, Accession, and Tradition; and Predial Servitudes were established and extinguished by 3 modes. There were 3 Personal Servitudes, the Usufructus, Usus, and Habitatio. There were 3 Obligations, Civil, Natural, and Prætorian; and 3 real Contracts, Loan, Deposit, and Pledge. In the Law of Succession we find 3 kinds of Heirs, the Necessarii, Sui et necessarii, and Extranei. There were also 3 modes of making a will, and in doing so testators might take advantage of the 3 kinds of Substitution, the Vulgaris pupillar, and Quasi pupillar. In Succession ab intestato, after the XII. tables, there were 3 classes called to succeed, the Sui heredes, Agnates, and Gentiles; and, according to the subsequent "Novels" of Justinian, 3 divisions also, Descendants, Ascendants, and Collaterals. There were 3 delegated judges, Judex, Arbiter, and Recooperatores; and the history of the Civil Procedure is divided into 3 periods—viz., the Legis Actiones, Formulary System, and Judicia Extraordinaria; and in the Formulary System the formula prepared by the prætor consisted of 3 distinct parts, the Demonstratio, Intentio, and Condemnatio. There were 3 kinds of Interdicts, Prohibitory, Restitutory, and Exhibitory. There were also 3 ordinary ways of proving points at issue admitted into Evidence, Writings, Witnesses, and "The Oath of Party"; and 3 Legal Presumptions, Presumptio juris et de jure, juris, and factis. The above analysis, which I have made with some pains, must speak for itself, and naturally prove the validity of my former statement that the number 3, in connection with the history of the Roman Civil Law, must be held sacred. To those, however, of your readers, especially students like myself, who derive pleasure from studying Roman Law, a perusal of my analysis cannot fail to be of interest, though the peculiarity I have endeavoured to point out may by some be deemed trivial.

ROMAN LAW.—If the number 7 is held sacred by students of the Holy Writings, the same may be applied to the number 3 in connection with the history of the Roman Civil Law. To commence: The History of the Roman Law before the Emperor Justinian is generally divided into 3 periods. From the foundation of the city to the compilation of the XII. tables, A. U. C. 305; 2nd period, from time of XII. tables to the commencement of the Empire, 723 A. U. C.; 3rd period, from the year 723 A. U. C. to the accession of Justinian, A.D. 357. During the first period we find there were 3 assemblies of the Roman people, the Comitia Curiata, the Comitia Centuriata, and Comitia Tributa. During the second, 3 forms of promulgating laws, the Leges populi, Leges Plebeie, and the Senatus-consulta; and during the third, there are 3 branches of the Imperial constitution, Rescripts, Edicts, and Decrees. From the law of persons we find 3 senses of the word "status," Libertas, Civitas, Familia, and that men are considered under 3 divisions—Freemen and Slaves, Citizens and Foreigners—men in juris and alieni juris; that minors are subdivided into 3 classes, Infants, Pupils, and Adults: that this status can be acquired and lost in 3 ways, and the 3 forms of Capitis Diminutio were Maxima, Media, and Minima. Citizenship was acquired in 3 ways and lost in 3 ways; Slavery

104. NEW RULES UNDER JUDICATURE ACTS.—I have relied on the LAW TIMES to keep me posted up in all the latest Orders under the Judicature Acts, and have not bought separate prints of such Orders. In the LAW TIMES, July 15, 1876 (61 L. T., 205), amongst the new Rules then given, I find Order 36, Rules 29, 30, 31, &c. In the LAW TIMES of Dec. 2, 1876 (62 L. T., 88), amongst the Rules of December, 1876, is another, Order 36, Rule 29 a, which does not say that it repeals the former, and is on a different subject. How is this? W. C. H.

105. PERPETUAL COMMISSIONERS AND COMMISSIONERS FOR OATHS.—Will you, or any of your readers, say what is the necessary qualification for a commissioner for taking acknowledgments by married women, and for a Commissioner for Oaths respectively, describing how to proceed with a view to appointment? S. S. C. (Admitted 1873.)

[As to acknowledgment of deeds, the application is made to the Chief of the Common Pleas Division; a Commissioner for Oaths is granted by the Lord Chancellor. You have not been admitted sufficiently long to warrant your applying for either appointment.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

106. COMMISSIONER FOR OATHS.—Will any of your readers inform me what preliminaries have to be gone through to enable an advocate practising in the Isle of Man to obtain a commission appointing him a Commissioner in the Isle of Man to administer oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature? F.

[An application to the Lord Chancellor upon forms which are set out in Ford's Handbook on Oaths, page 42, and published at the office of this journal.—ED.]

107. COMMISSIONER TO ADMINISTER OATHS.—PRACTISING SOLICITOR.—The forms of application to be appointed a commissioner certify the applicant to be a "practising solicitor." Is it essential that he should be actually practising in his own name, or would a managing clerk who has taken out his certificate for the prescribed period, and has been engaged in duties similar to those undertaken by his principals, including advocacy, be rightly so described? What would be the position of a sleeping partner? LEX.

[We have already stated our views on these points.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

108. ENTERING APPEARANCE, CHANCERY DIVISION AND COMMON LAW DIVISION.—Is it the proper course for a defendant, who enters an appearance to a writ of summons in either of the above divisions, to give notice thereof to the plaintiff, and is the defendant in any way prejudicially affected by not doing so? Does not the Judicature Act, 1875, Order 12, Rule 6, affect the practice? STUDENS.

[We deal with this in another column.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

109. TESTACY AND INTEREST.—PERSONAL ESTATE.—A testator dies, having, by his will, bequeathed certain property to B.; but, having other property than that bequeathed to B., and, as to which the will being silent, he dies intestate. There are debts to be satisfied out of the estate. Will the property bequeathed to B., or the property not disposed of by his will (and which the next of kin claim) be liable for the debts, and in what proportions? Please give the reason for your answer. AN ARTICLED CLERK.

110. VALUATION OF COPYHOLDS.—Will any of your readers inform me where I can get the best information as to calculating the saleable value of copyhold manor? X. Y. Z.

111. LEASEHOLDS—MERGER.—A, an under lessee for a short term, deposits his lease with B., by way of equitable security. A. subsequently buys the original lease of the same property, which is for a long term; this he mortgages to C. for its full value, C. being without notice of the underlease. A. is now bankrupt. Has the under lease merged in the original lease, or what right has B. against the property? S. S. C.

112. STAMP.—A. and B. are entitled to an estate for the life of another in certain premises jointly with C., to whom the remainder is also limited; C. mortgages in fee, A. and B. joining at the request of the mortgagee, but receiving no part of the mortgage money; subsequently, in consideration of £1200, A. and B. convey their shares to C. subject to the mortgage. As the mortgage money forms no part of the consideration for this conveyance, it ought to be sufficiently stamped with 2s. Is this so, or do the words in the 73rd section of the Stamp Act of 1870, "subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock," render it necessary to pay duty on the combined purchase and mortgage money? a result, I should think, scarcely contemplated by the legislature in such a case as this. W. H.

113. SUCCESSION AND RESIDUARY ACCOUNTS AND OBTAINING PROBATE.—Can you or any of your readers recommend me a good practical work on preparing successions and residuary accounts, and proving wills and taking out administration? LEX.

114. BANKRUPTCY—FIXTURES.—A. deposits with B. a lease, by way of equitable security, accompanied by a short memorandum of the object of the deposit. A. has filed his petition in liquidation, and the trustee claims the fixtures on the property (consisting of engines and machinery), on the ground that the equitable mortgage should have been registered as a bill of sale. (See Barclay v. L. Rep. 9, Ch. 576). Has the mortgagee a claim to the fixtures in the present case, and would it have made any difference (1) if there had been no memorandum accompany the deposit? (2) if there had been a legal mortgage? A reference to cases will oblige. LEX.

115. MERGER.—A. purchases the fee of a piece of land on which a house stands, subject to a lease, for a long term, of the house. He afterwards obtains an assignment of this lease, subject to a mortgage thereof to a building society. A. afterwards mortgages the piece of land, subject to the lease and mortgage thereof, to the building society, to B., who has notice of the prior dealings with the property. Will the lease have merged, or will B. be entitled to the ground rents by virtue of his mortgage? Would it have made any difference if A. had purchased the lease of the house before the lease? S. S. C.

116. SOLICITOR'S LIABILITY.—In connection with this question in the LAW TIMES of the 17th Feb., what is the duty of a solicitor acting for vendor and purchaser on an assignment of leaseholds, where, before the purchase is completed, a notice of dilapidations is served by the landlord: is he bound to treat this as received on behalf of the vendors to whom it is directed, and to withhold the fact from the purchaser, or to acquaint the purchaser at the risk of his throwing up the contract; and, if the information be withheld, has the purchaser a right of action against the solicitor on the ground of negligence or otherwise? X.

Answers.

(Q. 97.) VENDORS AND PURCHASERS ACT, 1874, SECT. 4.—In this case I should consider that the mortgagee's legal personal representative cannot transfer the legal estate to the transferee. Sect. 4 of the above act only seems to apply where a mortgage is paid off, and not where it is transferred; and so long as the transaction continues to be a mortgage, the section would not have application, but the heir of the mortgagee must transfer the legal estate. "J. G." will find the question discussed in Charley's Real Property Acts, 1874.

ENGLAND HOWLETT.

—It seems doubtful whether this section was intended to apply to transfers of mortgages at all. The expression "on payment of all moneys secured by the mortgage," seems to point to the payment off of the mortgage debt by the mortgagor, so that nothing is left in the mortgagee's representative but the dry legal estate. The mortgage debt continues, notwithstanding a transfer. Not merely the "hereditaments" are transferred, but the mortgage debt, and the covenants and powers, which forms a supplemental security for the mortgage debt, are transferred also. So long as the transaction continues to be a mortgage, this section, it is apprehended, does not apply. (See Notes to Charley's Real Property Acts, 1874, page 98.) A. P.

Application.

(Q. 21.) SOLICITOR TRUSTEE—COSTS.—The adjudication of the commissioners is quite in accordance with the proviso in the 75th section. The appointment of new trustees, and the conveyance of trust estates are considered as distinct transactions, the former being liable to a duty of 10s., the latter to the ordinary duty as a conveyance, assignment, transfer of mortgage, &c., as the case may be, but not exceeding in any case 10s. Of course if either of these objects be effected by separate deed (and sometimes several are necessary), such deed will only be liable to its own particular duty. W. H.

LAW SOCIETIES.

CRIMINAL LAW EVIDENCE.

A SPECIAL meeting of the members of the Law Amendment Society was held last Monday evening at its rooms, 1, Adam-street, Adelphi, for the purpose of considering the report of the jurisprudence department on "The amendment of the law of evidence by admitting the testimony of prisoners, defendants, and of their husbands and wives in criminal proceedings." The chair was taken by the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, M.P., and amongst those present were Mr. Serjeant Cox, Dr. Waddilove, Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., Mr. Saunders (barrister), &c.

A paper on the subject was read by Mr. Alfred Hill, a Birmingham magistrate, at the meeting of the association at Brighton in 1875, in the jurisprudence department, wherein it was stated that in many of the States of the North American Union, this proposed change in the law affecting criminal evidence had been made, and was working satisfactorily. After a discussion a resolution was passed:—"That this section requests the council of the association to take in consideration the propriety of having a paper of queries prepared and sent round to the Chief Justice and Attorney-General of every state of the United States and each province of the Dominion of Canada, and such other persons as it may think fit, requesting answers respecting the admitting the testimony of prisoners and defendants in criminal cases, and their husbands and wives."

In pursuance of this request the council referred the matter to the Jurisprudence Committee, which body caused a form of queries to be printed and sent to the persons mentioned in the resolution of the section. To these queries answers had been received from four of the British provinces, viz., British Columbia, New Brunswick, Ontario, and Quebec, and from twenty States of the Union, viz., first, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and Texas; and secondly, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, Oregon, and Wisconsin. In those British provinces from whence answers had been received no part of the proposed change in the law had yet been made, as was also the case in the States of the Union, first enumerated, while of those mentioned secondly, in Georgia, the change appeared to be little more than nominal, though, as far as it went, it seemed to give satisfaction. In Florida the prisoner might give evidence on oath, but was not to be cross-examined, and in Oregon he was only allowed, after conviction, to testify on matters bearing on the question of punishment. But in all the remaining States whence answers had arrived, prisoners were now permitted, if they pleased, to give evidence on oath, and in Connecticut, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, and Michigan, they might also call their husbands and wives. In no State was the prisoner bound to give evidence, and in no case (except where the course might be taken at common law) could the husband or the wife be examined, save at the prisoner's instance. From the answers from all the States it appeared that the experience of every one of the officers who had replied—all Chief Justices or Attorney-Generals of States, or United States Judges—was favourable to the change, which, they say, gave general satisfaction, and occasioned no hardship or injustice to the prisoner. The answers from States where the new system had been in existence a long while, generally where emphatically in its praise. Thus, Mr. Train, the Attorney-General of Massachusetts, where the new experience was adopted in 1860, says:—"After thirty years' experience in my profession, I know of no one change which has been so productive of beneficial results." The Attorney-General of Maine (Mr. Emery), earnestly hopes that the change will be made in the United Kingdom, stating that only professional criminals and gamblers object to it in Maine. Mr. Appleton, chief justice of the same State, writes:—"I have taken much interest in the subject of evidence, and a long experience has fully satisfied me that the admission of the evidence of defendants in criminal cases is absolutely indispensable for the purposes of justice." Mr. Ketterel, Attorney-General of Nevada, where the change was made in 1867, says that "it has worked excellently, has caused no injustice, and has simply tended to disclose the truth in doubtful cases." Seeing that, according to the old saying, "an ounce of testimony is worth a pound of theory" this uniform testimony to the benefits of the change must have great weight, for in so many states, in some of which the new practice had obtained during many years, had the admission of prisoner's evidence produced the evils feared by some, they could not fail to have become manifest. Although the experience of the effect of admitting the evidence of their husbands and wives was less extensive than in the case of the prisoners themselves, still the testimony in its favour was equally uniform. In conclusion, the committee did not think it necessary to further argue the question, and therefore felt themselves justified in confidently recommending both changes to the favourable consideration of the association. The following were the queries sent to the Chief Justice and the Attorney-General of each of the United States of America, and of each province of the Dominion of Canada.

1. In your state are prisoners and defendants in criminal proceedings, and their wives or husbands, allowed to give evidence on oath for defence?
2. If so, is this course optional on the part of the prisoner or defendant, his wife or her husband, or can he be compelled to give evidence?
3. When so under examination can the prisoner or defendant (or the wife or husband) be examined, cross-examined, and re-examined in the same manner, and subject to the same liabilities and immunities as other witnesses?
4. When so under examination is the prisoner liable to be cross-examined as to his previous character and conduct, and particularly can he be asked whether he has committed previous offences?
5. If the examination or cross-examination of prisoners is allowed, is it conducted by counsel or by the judge, whether at the preliminary examination or the final trial, and at what stage of the examination or trial?
6. Has your system been changed in the above respects, and if so how long?
7. If your system has been changed in favour of admitting the testimony of prisoners, how has the new system worked in practice, and has it given satisfaction to the Profession and the public?
8. Especially has the change been productive of any real hardship or injustice to the innocent, or has it assisted in bringing the guilty to punishment?

Mr. Alfred Hill said that he had taken great pains to inquire how the change in the law had worked in the United States, and he certainly had never heard two opinions expressed. Every person he spoke to was decidedly in favour of the new law, as it would tend to improve the administration of criminal justice. It frequently happened that those whose mouths were closed in criminal proceedings were convicted. From experience on the bench for four years, he could say that when a cross-summons was taken out the case was far more satisfactorily decided, for then both sides were heard, the plaintiff in one summons being the defendant in the other. In conclusion, Mr. Hill moved, "That the report of the standing Committee of Municipal Law now read be received, and that the council be recommended to take such action as it deems fit in support of Mr. Ashley's Bill now before Parliament for the admission of the testimony of prisoners or defendants on criminal trials, and their husbands and wives."

Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., in seconding the motion, said, no doubt every person had read of the execution of Mr. De Tourville, for the supposed murder of his wife in throwing her down a precipice in the Tyrol. The accused had the opportunity of resisting the demand for the Extradition because the Extradition Treaty did not extend to Austria; but he purposely elected to be given up to the Austrian Government, because in that country he could open his mouth at the trial, which he could not do in England. The case was by itself an argument in favour of Mr. Ashley's Bill. (Hear, hear.) It did seem absurd that, for a defendant to give evidence in a criminal trial, he was bound to take out a cross-summons. The experiment of a change in the law in this respect had been tried in America at certain States which were known to be highly cultivated, and it was found that the testimony given was all but unanimous in its favour. (Hear, hear.) He (the speaker) could never understand why the great principle of audi alteram partem should not be adopted in criminal proceedings. It was the grossest affront to common sense not to act upon that principle. What was the object of courts of justice but to detect the guilty? He hoped soon to see the preposterous and absurd notion of closing the mouths of defendants in criminal proceedings done away with.

Mr. Saunders said that no doubt it was very desirable both the parties should be heard, but prisoners had now abundant opportunities of presenting their cases to the jury, the only difference being that they were not sworn, though they could give what evidence they liked. With regard to wives, generally speaking they would forswear themselves for their husbands' sake. Upon the whole, any proposed change in the law in this respect was deserving of very great consideration, and he thought that no very great advantage to the ends of public justice would be gained by altering the present state of the law.

Dr. Waddilove said that, having had the subject before them for sixteen years, it was rather hard they should be asked to pause now. It seemed to him to be a proper step on the part of the chairman to introduce the matter in the House of Commons (hear, hear), and on the back of the Bill he was glad to see the name of Mr. Russell Gurney, the recorder of London. He (the speaker) trusted the matter would receive the attention of Parliament, for he was an earnest advocate of the measure.

Mr. Ryalls (barrister) was not opposed to any change of the law on the subject, for he did not think there would be any harm in the first instance in allowing the testimony of defendants to be given in many of those cases which were tried in the inferior criminal law courts, especially assault cases; but with regard to the more serious offences, he did not think the courts of justice demanded any change. (Hear, hear.) There could be no objection to criminals making a statement; but then came the question as regarded their cross-examination. He would be very sorry for a prisoner to be convicted by cross-examination.

Mr. Serjeant Cox had certainly formed a strong opinion upon this subject, and had come to a most decided conclusion. Nothing could be more dangerous to the interests of criminal justice in this country than the admission of the evidence of defendants in criminal cases. It would reverse the whole of the policy of the English law. The great guiding principle was, that a man should be deemed to be innocent until he was proved guilty. The undoubted and immediate effect of admitting the evidence of criminals in their own cases would be to reverse that principle. It was impossible by any Act of Parliament to govern the tongues of men, for there were a thousand ways of insinuating and implying a certain thing. If the principle proposed were carried out, it would undoubtedly have the effect of convicting a great number of persons who otherwise would not be convicted. The practical effect of cross-examination he was confident would be utterly fatal to the most innocent man. No man could be sent to trial unless he had a prima facie case against him, and no man was ever sent for trial unless he was involved in certain cases that had an aspect of guilt. If he (the learned serjeant) were permitted to cross-examine prisoners brought before him, he would undertake to convict ninety-nine out of every hundred, who were certainly guilty, though some cases failed for want of proof; no prisoners ever told the truth, and in affiliation cases they could never trust the defendant. Why reverse the ancient principle of law for so slight a purpose? In assault and libel cases no doubt the evidence of the defendants would be admissible as a witness, because these were matters in which there were nearly always two sides to a question. There was fortunately great confidence felt in the administration of justice, and no charge could improperly be brought against a person. (Hear, hear.)

The Hon. Evelyn Ashley, M.P. (the chairman), said that the strong feelings he had on the subject had not been in the least shaken by the discussion. From the very first day he went circuit he began to see the folly of shutting the mouths of defendants in criminal trials, and determined, if ever he got a seat in Parliament, to bring in a Bill on the question. He had since twice brought the matter before the House of Commons, and intended to again this session. (Hear, hear.) He denied that the system, if adopted, would lead to that pursued in France, for the judges in this country were raised from the Bar, and were well known to be lenient towards prisoners. He could not understand how men could be proved guilty by cross-examination, for the more nervous and frightened a man got in the witness box the more certain was he to stick to the truth. He did not think the administering of an oath the slightest importance whatever, for the proper test of evidence was cross-examination. (Hear.) When the Bill was before Parliament the chief opposition came from Sir Thomas Chambers and the Attorney-General, the arguments of the latter principally being that if the Bill were passed it would be the means of increasing cases of perjury, but this he (the speaker) denied. In conclusion, to quote Bentham, he would say, "Innocence demands the privilege of speech; guilt demands the immunity of silence."

costs in a poaching prosecution—he might have refused them without assigning any reason. He voluntarily, however, lays himself open to attack by saying that if the rich wish to protect their amusements they must pay for it. This is equivalent to saying that in the opinion of Lord COLERIDGE game ought not to be considered property, and that a man who poaches on preserves does nothing worse than he would do were he to walk across Lord's during a match. Such an opinion may be entertained, but that it should be expressed on the Bench is a decided misfortune.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL and MR. OSBORNE MORGAN are indisposed to extend the jurisdiction of County Courts. It is stated, however, that suitors are of a different opinion. There is less civil business at the assizes than there was formerly, and the reason assigned is that suitors go, not to London, but into the County Courts, by waiving excess, or by defendants consenting to those courts having jurisdiction—that they prefer to do this when the alternative is being hung up for an indefinite period in the Superior Court. This objection, however, would not apply to the assizes; but the truth is that numerous causes were entered for trial in London in the hope of getting to trial soon, when they might have been entered at the assizes, and this, in our opinion, is why the civil business in the country is small. The increase in business in the County Courts is really only in proportion to the increase in the Superior Courts, and we doubt whether the "block" has really sent much business into the County Courts.

ONE or two applications have been recently made to the Court of Appeal at Lincoln's-inn in bankruptcy matters for leave to appeal to the House of Lords, and it has been suggested that it is no longer necessary to obtain such leave. Sect. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, gives the right of appeal to the House of Lords "with the leave of the Court of Appeal." By sect. 9, sub-sect. 2 of the Judicature Act 1875, "The appeal from the London Court of Bankruptcy shall lie to the Court of Appeal in accordance with the principal Act," that is to say, just as if the Bankruptcy Court had remained consolidated with the other divisions of the High Court, as it was by sect. 3 of the Judicature Act 1873. Then, by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876, by sect. 3, "subject as in this Act mentioned, an appeal shall lie to the House of Lords from any order or judgment of her MAJESTY'S Court of Appeal in England." It seems, therefore, impossible to say that leave is any longer necessary in order that a bankruptcy appeal should be carried to the House of Lords.

It is satisfactory to know that the Government is alive to the necessity of doing something to relieve the block in the courts, and to get rid of the scandal arising from the denial of justice which is caused thereby. The equity lawyers in the House revealed the true facts of the position in all their enormity, making a case which the ATTORNEY-GENERAL did not attempt to answer, and indeed which he had no desire to answer otherwise than by saying that it must be dealt with. We cannot say that the Government is wrong in hesitating considerably before increasing the number of Judges in the Common Law Divisions. There should first be an inquiry whether the Judges cannot be relieved of some of their work at chambers, and at Nisi Prius, by the official referees. If commissioners can try common jury cases on circuit, why should not the official referees do the same in London and Middlesex? If they are not qualified they ought to be. In the Chancery Division there is no such source to go to: one or more Judges must be appointed—this is admitted by the Government.

It is rarely that the Profession enjoys the privilege of receiving judicial interpretation of such an expression as "crotchety technicality." That expression was used by BRETT, J.A., in a case which courted and invited all the abuse which could properly be bestowed upon it by the Bench (Lloyd v. Lewis, L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 7), and in getting rid of it as summarily as possible the above mentioned expression escaped the Justice of Appeal. Some one or other has taken it offensively, for we find that in Frederici v. Vanderzee (at p. 73 of L. Rep. 2 O. P. Div.), the Justice of Appeal, referring to the expression he used in Lloyd v. Lewis, says, "I am told that I have been supposed to have used these words with respect to the decisions of some of the judges. I had no such intention, and what I said related to no particular person engaged in the case, but to crotchety persons who from time to time suggest technical subtleties in construing these rules." Really an explanation of this kind hardly deserved preservation in the "authorised" reports. The thin skins of the individuals, whoever they were, who took to themselves the epithet of the Justice of Appeal, might have been saved by a private communication of the explanation. We have to be thankful, however, that no reference is made to it in the head-note of the report, where we should not have been much surprised to find it thus: "Crotchety technicality—Meaning of: Per BRETT, J.A., in explanation, not applied in Lewis v. Lloyd to any Judges or counsel in particular, but to crotchety persons without distinction who suggest technical subtleties."

The Law and the Lawyers.

THE author of the "appeal clause" in the last County Court Act claims for it the high distinction of having given rise to more decided cases than any section of any Act passed in the same year. The Law "Amendment" Society appears to have received the announcement with equanimity!

It is always matter for lamentation when a Judge unnecessarily lays himself open to criticism. Unhappily Lord COLERIDGE has done this more than once. He has described penal servitude as slavery, and, in spite of much adverse comment, he persists in so speaking of it when sentencing prisoners. He has now refused

APPOINTMENT TO TWO IN JOINT TENANCY—ONE NOT BEING AN OBJECT OF THE POWER.

THE Master of the Rolls in Re Kerr's Trusts, which came before him on the 3rd ult., had to decide in what he said was a new case. A testator, by a will dated in 1862, had bequeathed certain funds in trust for his daughter for life, with remainder to her husband for life, with remainder to the children of the daughter as she and her husband by deed, or as the survivor by deed or will should appoint, and in default of appointment for the children of the daughter at twenty-one or marriage. There was no hotchpot clause. The daughter having survived her husband, in exercise of her power, by will appointed all her right and interest under the will of her father "unto her children Charlotte Morton and Catharine Young, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said C. Morton and C. Young for their own absolute use and benefit." The testatrix left the above-named and other children her surviving. Charlotte Morton having been born before her mother's marriage, the question was what interest C. Young, the daughter born in wedlock, took under the appointment. The Master of the Rolls held that C. Young took a moiety only under the appointment, and in consequence of there being no hotchpot clause an equal share with the testatrix's legitimate children in the other moiety under the gift in default of appointment.

We do not quite understand whether Sir G. Jessel meant to decide that a joint tenancy created, or purported to be created, by way of appointment, is different from a joint tenancy created or purported to be created by immediate devise or bequest, or that the identical language which in an immediate devise or bequest would create a joint tenancy with all its incidents, is insufficient to create such a tenancy if employed by a mere appointor. So far as the case has hitherto been reported, it does not appear that there was anything beyond the form of the gift as one in ordinary joint tenancy from which any intention applicable to the point in dispute could be inferred. If the inference of the Master of the Rolls rested simply on the form of an appointment, which was to two persons as joint tenants, one of whom was incapable of taking, we are unable to satisfy ourselves of the propriety of the decision, for it seems reasonably clear that, notwithstanding the old dictum about joint tenancy being odious in equity, language which would create a joint tenancy with all its consequences in a devise or bequest, must also create a similar tenancy with like consequences, if used in an appointment. We do not understand that the learned judge at all wished to dispute the soundness of the rule in an ordinary case of joint tenancy, viz., that the failure, or incapacity to take, of one object enures for the benefit of the others, as was decided in Davies v. Kempe (Carter's Rep. 2), Larkins v. Larkins (3 Bos. & P. 16), Morley v. Bird (3 Ves. 629), to which his own very recent decision of Re Coleman and Jarrom (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 614), following Fell v. Biddolph (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 864), as to the effect of the failure or incapacity of a member of a class, is strictly analogous.

To discover the primary intention of a testator is often enough a task which taxes to the utmost the powers of the judicial interpreter, but when, contrary to the expectation of a testator, his primary intention is defeated by accident or operation of law, then, as it seems to us, it is generally speaking a mistake to endeavour to find out what the testator would have done if informed of the miscarriage that awaited his original intentions.

Such endeavours for the most part result in mere speculation, such as ought not to form the basis of judicial decision, and if indulged in would speedily render the conscience or sagacity of the individual Judge the measure of justice. In these failing cases we greatly prefer the certainty arising from following settled rules, or presumptions, or analogies, to any conceivable sagacity on the part of a Judge in divining the intentions of a testator, supposing him capable of such an effort. In the great majority of cases the rules or presumptions or analogies established by law do probably effect what would have been the intentions of a testator, but whether this be so or not, fixed rules of construction are of such paramount importance that we regret to observe any tendency to narrow or escape from them. When these rules are objectionable, as, e.g., the rules which require to be neutralised by hotchpot clauses or other special provisions, the remedy rests with the Legislature. In regard to one of these rules, viz., the rule that a gift of residue shall include everything not effectually disposed of, Sir G. Jessel, while unhesitatingly adhering to the rule, has, in his judgment in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 372), well shown that in point of fact it would in many cases not accord with the testator's intention, and is, in truth, making a will for him. We are inclined to think that a similar adhesion to authority would have allowed the appointee in joint tenancy as being entitled per tout as well as per mie, and who in any case would have had the ius accrescendi by survivorship, if there had been no partition, to retain the whole of the appointed fund.

The case is not one of a remainder by appointment, though somewhat similar. In such a case, according to the opinion of Lord St. Leonards, which, perhaps, needs confirmation, if the particular estate fails, the remainder is not accelerated but continues such, and the estate during the life of the intended taker goes as in default of appointment: (Crozier v. Crozier, 3 Dr. & Warren, 365, 366).

It is difficult to see why the joint tenant capable of taking should actually be in a worse position than if the appointment had been of a moiety in remainder after the death of the incapacitated appointee.

SPECIAL REPLIES AND REJOINDERS UNDER THE JUDICATURE ACT.

FOUR cases (Earp v. Henderson, 34 L. T. Rep., N. S. 844; London and St. Katharine's Docks Company v. Metropolitan Railway Company, 35 Id. 733; Hall v. Eve, Id. 735; on appeal, 926; Norris v. Beazeley, Id. 845), have been recently reported by us, and from time to time alluded to in these columns, in all of which the same point was substantially involved, a point of some interest to students of the Judicature Acts, and of great practical importance to the pleader. In the three first mentioned cases, which were all originally before Vice-Chancellor Bacon, the question was whether, where in answer to a statement of claim a defence has been put in, the effect of which is to render it necessary for the plaintiff to allege new matter in support of his original statement, such new matter should be inserted in a reply or introduced by way of amendment into the statement of claim; whilst in Norris v. Beazeley the point under the consideration of the Common Pleas Division was almost precisely similar, the only difference being that there it was the defendant, who was also plaintiff by counterclaim, who claimed to be allowed to introduce the new matter into his rejoinder, or, as it really was, reply. The decision upon each occasion was to the effect that the proper method was to introduce the fresh matter by way of amendment of the previous pleading. The Chancery cases, which we shall notice before devoting a concluding word to Norris v. Beazeley, have been, however, overruled by the Court of Appeal in Hall v. Eve (ubi sup.), and the question raised in them we presume definitely settled.

After a consideration of the provisions of the Judicature Act 1875, we confess we are unable to see how the point could ever have been deemed arguable, and still less the force of the reasons upon which the learned Vice-Chancellor based his opinion. These, indeed, seem both to have originated in misconception and mistake. In the first place, he relied upon Order XIX., rules 14 and 19, it being enacted by the former that "no new assignment shall hereafter be necessary or used. But everything which has heretofore been alleged by way of new assignment may hereafter be introduced by amendment of the statement of claim," whilst the latter provides that "No pleading, not being a petition or summons shall, except by way of amendment, raise any new ground of claim, or contain any allegation of fact inconsistent with the previous pleadings of the party pleading the same." Now of course it is obvious that by rule 14 new assignments were abolished, but what was a new assignment? Merely a statement that the plaintiff was proceeding for another cause of action than that admitted in the plea. Again, all that is substantially laid down by rule 19, is that the old and well known principle of pleading that there must be no "departure," shall be preserved. In Coke upon Littleton (304a), a departure in pleading is said to be, "when the second plea containeth matter not pursuant to his former, and which fortifieth not the same;" and if the pleadings in the three cases we have alluded to are even superficially examined, we think that it will be quite clear that neither a new assignment nor a departure is contained in them. Taking Hall v. Eve as a representative case, we find the facts there very succinctly stated by Lord Justice James (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 927.) "The plaintiff by his statement of claim said, 'I am entitled to specific performance of a certain agreement.' The defendants, by the statement of defence, said, 'You have committed breaches of the agreement which entitle us to put an end to it.' The plaintiff in his reply said, 'Your allegations are not true, and if they are, the things which you say I have done I was induced to do by you.' (A waiver of the breaches was also alleged.) In this reply no fresh cause of action is introduced, and there is no inconsistency with the statement of claim which, on the contrary, to use Lord Coke's expression, is fortified by the reply; all that is done is to get rid of the defence by means of a confession and avoidance. The second point taken by the learned Vice-Chancellor may be very briefly disposed of. In Earp v. Henderson (ubi sup.) he is reported to have said, in allusion to Form 9 of Appendix C. of the Act of 1875, that the note to the reply there given was: "The facts stated in reply should in general be introduced by amendment into the statement of claim." This is a misreading. We do not know what copy of the Act Sir James Bacon had in his hand, but in all that we have seen the words are: "The facts stated in this reply," &c., and, indeed, forms of special reply are given frequently in Appendix C. (See, amongst others, Forms 6, 10, 12, and 21.)

If the reasons thus given in favour of disallowing special replies had been much stronger than in our opinion they are, we quite agree with the Court of Appeal in Hall v. Eve, in thinking that rule 2 of Order XIX. must be taken as concluding the question. It is there provided that "No pleading subsequent to reply other than a joinder of issue shall be pleaded without leave of the court or a judge," and what would be the use of having any pleadings whatever subsequent to reply, if the reply was in no case to consist of more than a mere joinder of issue? The argumentum ab inconvenienti was also put very strongly by Lord Justice James. "It was no part," said he "of the statement of claim to anticipate the defence, and to state what the plaintiff would have to say in answer to it. This would be a return to the old system of pleading in the Court of Chancery, which certainly ought not to be encouraged when the plaintiff used to allege in his bill imaginary defences of the defendant, and to make charges in reply to them." Sir George Bramwell also, after remarking that he was not influenced by any love of the old special pleading which he had done his best, for a quarter of a century, to get rid of, and which he was happy to think was at last abolished, observed that, even under that system, the rule was "that you should not leap before you came to the stile." . . . He considered it was a mischievous practice to anticipate a defence, because the plaintiff could not tell what defence would be raised, and so was bound to anticipate all the possible defences which could be raised, which must lead to great length of pleadings. After these remarks we have not much fear of the question raised in Hall v. Eve being again mooted; but the decision in the Appeal Court should be carefully noted, inasmuch as recent editions of the Judicature Acts, whilst calling attention to Earp v. Henderson, and the other two Chancery cases we have alluded to, have necessarily been unable to point out how they have been overruled by the final decision in Hall v. Eve.

To this decision we think Norris v. Beazeley is opposed. By rule 3 of Order XIX., it is in terms laid down that a set-off or counter-claim shall have the same effect as a statement of claim in a cross-action, and it is, in our opinion, flying directly in the teeth of that provision to hold that the defendant should not have the same right to allege new matter in his rejoinder as the plaintiff has to insert it in his reply. That a rejoinder, other than a simple denial of what is contained in the reply, is permissible, appears clearly from rule 2 of Order XXIV., and the argument that the effect of allowing such a rejoinder to be set up would be to cause protracted pleadings is of no more force in the case of a plaintiff by counter-claim than in that of a plaintiff by original action.

ON THE CONSTRUCTION OF WILLS.

GENERAL WORDS SUFFICIENT TO PASS REAL ESTATE.

It appears to us to be somewhat unfortunate that cases bearing solely on the construction of particular documents (other than well-known mercantile documents), should ever have been reported at all. As soon as one case is reported, it follows as a necessary consequence that another, somewhat different, is recorded; and so the cases multiply, a conflict of decisions in many instances ensues, and in the end, the construction of a particular document is made to rest upon one or the other of these conflicting decisions. (The construction must inevitably by these means become artificial, for instead of basing its decision on the document itself, the Court is tied down by former constructions given to other documents differing, in many respects from the one before it.)

This is strongly exemplified in cases where the question is, whether the real estate of a testator passes under a residuary bequest. The question came before the Exchequer Division in the case of Evans v. Jones, in the argument of which a startling conflict in the decided cases was made manifest.

In Evans v. Jones there was first a bequest in the following terms: "I give and bequeath to my said wife all my household furniture, linen, glass, china, plate, &c., and all my personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever," and then followed the words, "or whatever I may be possessed of at my decease, to and for her sole use and benefit." The Court held, upon the authority of Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664), and Re The Greenwich Hospital Improvement Act (20 Beav. 458) that the words were sufficient to carry the real estate which the testator was possessed of at his death. The cases relied upon by the other side were Monk v. Mawdsley (1 Simons B. 286) and Cook v. Jaggard (L. Rep. 1 Ex. 125); and certainly it does not seem to us an easy matter to draw a substantial distinction between the case in question and that last cited.

In Monk v. Mawdsley a feme covert, having power to dispose by will of personal property and of a real estate at N., by her will, after reciting the power, and giving several pecuniary legacies, continued: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my husband my two fields and house at Great Neston (being the estate of which she had power to dispose), likewise the remainder of my personalty, and all I may die possessed of at the time of my death." It was held that the fee in the two fields and house at Great Neston did not pass to the husband by force of the expression, "And all I may die possessed of at the time of my death." Sir John Leach treated the words as mere surplusage, and obviously not intended to pass real estate.

In Cook v. Jaggard, the testator disposed of his property as follows: "All the rest of my worldly estate, both real and personal, I give, devise, and bequeath as follows:" [Then followed two specific devises of certain copyhold premises to S. W., and the heirs of her body.] "And all the rest, residue, and remainder of my personal estate and effects wheresoever and whatsoever, and of what nature, kind or quality soever the same may be, moneys, securities for money, or whatever I may be possessed of or entitled to at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the same to my said daughter S. W., to and for her own use absolutely." The court held that the residuary clause did not pass to the devisee the remainder in fee of the copyhold premises specifically devised to her in tail.

In Wilce v. Wilce, on the other hand, under the following will, "As touching such worldly property wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me, I give, devise, and dispose of the same in manner following" [here followed several bequests] "and all the rest of my worldly goods, bonds, notes, book debts, and ready money, and everything else I die possessed of, I give to my son George," the court held that George took a fee in lands of the testator not specifically devised by the will. Tindal, C.J., in his judgment, said that by "everything else" must be understood everything else not before disposed of. The case of Re The Greenwich Hospital Improvement Act was still stronger. There a testator "gave" to his wife, for her use and benefit, "his lease, moneys, goods, furniture, plate, book debts, securities for money, and all other property of every description that he might be possessed of," and it was held that the real estate passed. The Master of the Rolls in that case said: "The words, it is true, are associated with many other words exclusively applicable to personal estate, which are sufficient to include every species of personal estate; the words that follow must apply to something beyond, and not being applicable to anything else, I think they must pass the real estate."

In the case of Evans v. Jones the Court dealt with Cook v. Jaggard as follows: "The question in that case was," they said, "Whether under these words the reversion in fee expectant upon the determination of the estate tail passed. They held it did not. The express devise in tail stopping them, left the reversion to go to the heir, and the subsequent words might well in such cases be read as not applicable to that omission, but to the other property, which was all personal." But it is not so clear that this was in fact the ratio decidendi. It is true that Channell, B., in the course of the argument, alluding to Wilce v. Wilce, said, "in that case there was no preliminary specific devise of the property whereof the remainder was held to pass under the residuary clause. Have you any case where a similar clause has been held to pass the remainder of the very property specifically devised in a former part of the will?" But in his judgment he took up a much stronger position. He said "Then come the words, 'or whatever I may be possessed of or entitled to—following the description given of the property bequeathed, as moneys, &c., and coupled with that description by the word 'or.' That I think, shows that the words refer to property ejusdem generis with moneys. In Wilce v. Wilce the words were—'and everything else I die possessed of,' thus making as it were, a new head of property." He then proceeded to say that the residuary clause in question only applied to personal property, but, assuming the contrary, he distinguished Wilce v. Wilce on the other ground put in the argument. Therefore it does not seem to us to be at all clear that Cook v. Jaggard was necessarily decided on the ground put by the court. At all events there is a direct conflict between the Exchequer Division and Baron Channell on one point which goes to the root of the decision in both cases. In the case of Evans v. Jones the word "or" is used as it was in Cook v. Jaggard, "or whatever I may be possessed of at my decease." And Channell, B., based his decision a great deal upon the fact of that word being used. But the court, in Evans v. Jones, dealt with that word in quite a different way to that in which it was treated by the learned Baron. "We think," they said, "the latter words need not be read as part of one clause containing general words following a particular enumeration, but that they may be read as introducing a new subject by the word 'or.'" A contradiction in terms, showing that there is not only an apparent but a real conflict in these several decisions.

THIS is a very complete work, containing information of the most exhaustive character concerning the clergy of the Church of England. All who have business connexions with the clergy, or are interested in the purchase and sale of church property, can hardly dispense with a work of reference of this character. It appears to be thoroughly recognized by the clergy themselves, who, however, seem to have a great facility in sending information at the last moment. The editor, however, has done his best to deal with the exigencies of his position, giving all the additional matter in Addenda, and the result is a most comprehensive directory.

THE JUDICATURE ACTS.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, on rising to call attention "to the great and increasing delay which had occurred in the administration of justice," and to move that such delays could only be obviated "by an increase in the strength of the judicial and administrative departments of the High Court of Justice proportioned to the increased work imposed upon them," said that whatever differences might exist as to the resolution which he had placed upon the paper, no one could doubt that the time had arrived when we might fairly and usefully review the operation of the Judicature Acts. These Acts had been in operation nearly a year and a half, as legal years went, and it was not therefore too soon to take stock of their operation, and see how far the predictions which had been indulged in when they were under discussion had or had not been realised. Now he was bound to say that in one respect the working of the Acts had very agreeably disappointed public expectation. It was said that the judges could not safely be trusted to administer the new system until they had been educated up to its level. As far as his experience went no prediction could have been more unfounded. The judges had set to work honestly and loyally to carry out the new Acts both in the letter and in the spirit—both in the rules which they had framed and in the mode in which they construed the rules and the Acts themselves; and the consequence was that the new system had worked far better and more smoothly than anyone could have anticipated. How then, it might be asked, was it that everyone was complaining already of "the break of the Judicature Acts?" That was a question which he would endeavour to answer before he sat down. Now, some of his honourable friends might remember that when the Acts were under discussion he had pointed out that the result of improving their judicial system in the way they proposed to do would be to attract to the courts business which had never found its way there before; and, in that event, was it not to be expected that our existing machinery, which had been found barely sufficient for our existing wants, would break down under the additional strain thus imposed upon it? That apprehension was founded upon an assumption no doubt paradoxical in itself, but which was abundantly justified by experience, namely, that, up to a certain point, the result of every improvement in the administration of justice was not to diminish but increase litigation. (Hear, hear.) The fact was—humiliating as it was to admit it—that there were until very lately in England thousands of persons who deliberately consented to have their pockets picked, simply because they were more afraid of the law than of the law breaker. And, really, when he looked back at reports of cases decided some twenty or thirty years ago, and saw how the ingenuity of judges and counsel was strained to muddle away the merits of a case—how every importance was attributed to technicalities of pleading and practice, and none whatever to the right and justice of the case, he could scarcely wonder that a man having to choose between injustice and that sort of justice should deliberately come to the conclusion that upon the whole injustice was the lesser evil of the two. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Well, but they had changed all that. It was scarcely too much to say that recent reforms had made our judicial system, once the most technical and artificial in the world, one of the most simple and certain. For the first time in its history a suitor might feel confident that he would not be turned out of the Temple of Justice because he had got in by the wrong door, and that, if his case had any "merits," those merits would not be overlooked, and the result might be seen in the increase of business to which he had called attention. (Hear.) Now he was far from thinking that such an increase was matter for unmixed regret. On the contrary, he thought that, so far as it showed that the public were beginning to put more confidence in the administration of justice, it was matter for congratulation. But before coming to figures, he wished to advert to another circumstance which had helped to aggravate the existing block of business in one important branch of the High Court. Before the passing of the Judicature Acts, cases in the Court of Chancery were usually decided on affidavit evidence. Now he knew of no more ingenious process for not getting at the truth of a case than this system of affidavit evidence. But it had one great advantage. It materially shortened the hearing of a case. For a practised eye could easily separate the relevant from the irrelevant parts of an affidavit, whereas such a process of elimination became much more difficult when the truth had to be extracted, bit by bit, from a stupid, or unwilling, or dishonest witness. Now the Judicature Acts had provided that the evidence should be taken, as a rule, vis à vis in all the courts. But this change, which in the interests of truth was much to be commended, had been purchased at a considerable sacrifice of time, and the result had been that in the Chancery Division they had not only more cases to try but they occupied a longer time in trying them. Now he and other members had pointed out this at the time the Acts were debated, and had also called attention to the fact that the number of the judges of the Chancery Division had been fixed in the year 1841, at a time when railway companies and joint-stock enterprises generally were in their infancy, and when the wealth of the country and the materials for litigation were not a third as great as they were now. But they were arguing against the master of many legions, and if they had not the worst of the argument they were sure to have the worst of the division. The flat had gone forth that they might build their house as they pleased, but they must build it out of the old materials, and the result was to be seen in the figures to which he would now call attention. He wished to premise, however, that in his observations he would confine himself to the division in which he himself practised—the Chancery Division of the High Court; not but that delays equally scandalous would be found to exist in Westminster Hall; and he hoped that before he sat down some honourable friend of his would be found to throw light upon this part of the question. But he desired to dwell upon the state of things in the Chancery Division for two reasons—first, because he knew much more about it; and, secondly, because it was sometimes suggested that by some readjustment or redistribution of business they might get more work out of a common law judge. He believed that these suggestions were for the most part illusory. It was the old story of two persons trying to cover themselves with a blanket only large enough for one. If the one pulled it on himself the other was necessarily left out in the cold. (Hear, hear.) But, be this as it may, no such suggestion could be made as to the chancery judges. They worked as hard as men could work; they tried every question, whether of fact or law as it came before them; their courts were open practically all the year, and Parliament had lately shown its appreciation of their mode of conducting business by requiring the other judges to adopt it. Now what was the state of things in the Chancery Division? Before the Judicature Act came into operation the average number of cases waiting for hearing in the four courts of the Master of the Rolls and the three Vice-Chancellors at the beginning of each term was 800. At the beginning of the year 1875 it was 301; at the beginning of this year, when the Acts had been in operation a year and a quarter, the number had risen to 566, and the day before yesterday it was 698. But what was most significant was the gradual and progressive increase in these numbers. At the beginning of last year it was only 332, at Easter it had risen to 457, in June to 502, at Christmas to 566, and now it was 698! Well, but were these cases lighter? On the contrary, from a cause to which he had already referred, they were much heavier. And the strength of the judges, instead of being increased, was actually lessened, for under the old system the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices were members of the Court of Chancery, and one of those learned judges could, and very often did, sit with great effect to hear cases set down before judges of the first instance. But this was no longer possible, for now the Appeal Court formed a distinct tribunal. Indeed, the case was now reversed, for one of the four Chancery judges, the Master of the Rolls, was now a member of the Appeal Court, and was actually sitting in that court at this moment, his own court being of course shut up. So that, instead of, as before, borrowing a judge from the Appeal Court, the Chancery Division might be required to lend a judge to that court. Now let him ask this question: For ten years before the Judicature Acts the average number of cases and matters yearly originating in the Court of Chancery had been 2500; last year it was 5111. Now if four judges and their staffs were barely equal to dispose of 2500 cases, how could less than four judges and their staffs be expected satisfactorily to dispose of 5111? So that what they were attempting to do in fact was to put a quart of water into a pint pot, and that was a process which could not be satisfactorily accomplished even by Act of Parliament. (Laughter.) They had all heard of the unfortunate damsels who for sins done in the flesh were condemned in another world to fill a tub which leaked as fast it was filled; but he thought the task imposed upon their judicial Damsels was at least as cruel, for they were required to empty a tub which filled twice as quickly as they could empty it. (Renewed laughter.) But how did all this work in practice? For that was what the House would wish to hear. Why, simply this: the Vice-Chancellors were at this moment hearing cases which were set down for hearing eight, ten, and twelve months ago. Here was a letter written to him by a friend, in whose testimony he could confide, which gave a picture by no means exaggerated of a state of things which must be seen to be believed. "I have a case in your own court which has been waiting for hearing ever since March or April last, and it is still quite impossible to say when it will be reached. It only involves a short point of construction, and will not take half an hour when it comes on, but the parties will have had to wait almost a year for this half hour of judicial time. In the meantime it is impossible to administer and personal property of considerable amount, to the very great inconvenience of all concerned. Law taxes may be as bad in principle as Banham contended; but most suitors would find them a lesser evil than the present delay." Well, but suppose this "half hour of judicial time" seemed at last, and a decision pronounced, there was still the registrar's office to be passed, where a further delay of a month or six weeks took place, and then, if accounts had to be taken, came the most trying delay of all, that in the Judges' Chambers. He was told that it took at least a fortnight to get an appointment before the chief clerk, even for the most ordinary purpose. Let him read a letter received by an eminent firm of solicitors practising in the county represented by his honourable and learned friend opposite, Mr. Gregory, from their London agents, respecting a case in their office. It was dated the 14th Jan. 1877: "The order on further consideration made in May last has only within the last three weeks been obtained from the registrar. The share which Mrs. S. is interested in directed to be turned over to a separate account, with liberty to my party interested to apply. But before this can be done the costs must be taxed, the whole fund arranged, and the inquiry No. 2 answered. The contest with Mr. S.'s assignee will then have to be gone through. At the present time it certainly appears to us that at least a year must elapse before Mrs. S. can touch a single penny of its fund." And this in a country in which time was supposed to be money. Why, half the race in England would soon be presuming on this state of things to resist any just claim that might be made against them. (Hear, hear.) Only that morning a man had told him that he had been compelled to abate £500 of a claim to which he was as justly entitled as he (Mr. Morgan) was to his seat in the House, simply because he would have had to have waited two or three years before he could have established it, and the delay would have been ruin to him and his family. (Hear, hear.) Every one admitted the scandal—judges, counsel, solicitors, and suitors. He ought, perhaps, not to have said every one, for there was one most distinguished exception, the present Master of the Rolls. Sir George Jessel was, perhaps, the most rapid, acute, and clear-headed man who had ever sat upon the English Bench (hear, hear), but the value of his testimony in the present instance was, perhaps, a little impaired by one prominent trait in his character. He was a man who, as he himself had said, never entertained a doubt and never changed an opinion. (Laughter.) Now those who remembered how strenuously Sir George Jessel, when Solicitor-General, had opposed any increase in the judicial staff, would be prepared to hear that he had not altered his views on the subject. But even he could not say that there was a block in the Chancery Division; in fact, if his information was correct, there were at this moment 134 causes standing for hearing at the Rolls. But what Sir George Jessel was reported to have said was, that if it had not been for the common law actions which were brought into the Chancery Division, and if suitors would only take those causes elsewhere there would be no block in the Chancery Division. That was to say, if the Judicature Acts had never been passed, if suitors had not acquired the invaluable privilege of taking their causes to any court which they preferred, and if, too, the other courts were not themselves so crowded as to repel rather than attract them, then there would be no block in the Chancery Division. Was not that very much like saying, that if Napoleon Bonaparte's father had never happened to come across Napoleon Bonaparte's mother there would have been no battle of Waterloo. (Great laughter.) They must deal with things not as they might have been, but as they were, and as they themselves had made them. (Hear.) Well, then, the grievance being admitted, what was the remedy? Could they spare a couple of judges from Westminster Hall? (No.) These were the suggestions embodied in the amendment of his honourable friend the member for Cambridge (Mr. A. G. Marten). But to say nothing of the fact that some of them would not hold water in practice, they seemed to him too elaborate and specific to be dealt with on such an occasion as the present. Then there was the suggestion of his hon. friend the member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), to increase the jurisdiction of the County Courts. His hon. friend might be sure that when that proposal came before the House it bridge—viz., that they were authorised to charge a certain fee per hour before sitting, and that this had been distasteful, and perhaps unjust, to suitors. He had come to the conclusion that if the fees were diminished or abolished recourse would be more frequently had to the referees, and if they were not otherwise fully engaged they might be employed in getting rid of the surplus business at Judges' Chambers. In regard to the vacant Registrarship, no doubt it would be necessary for the Lord Chancellor to fill up the appointment. The Government desired to remove the block of legal business by an increase of judicial strength if the object could not be attained otherwise (hear); but it must be borne in mind that the system of trying cases by one judge had hardly as yet had a fair trial. The block was caused by the great arrears of Nisi Prius cases. A vast saving of time would be effected if shorthand writers were utilised in the Nisi Prius Courts throughout the country as in Parliamentary Committees. He did not say that the Government were considering the proposal to increase the number of the judges in the Common Law Divisions, though, of course, if, after a fair trial, the arrears were found to be still increasing, there would be nothing for it but such an addition to the number of judges. As to the suggested further alterations in the judiciary system, there should first be a full trial of the present system, recently altered as it had been. At present he did not see his way to enlarging the jurisdiction of the County Court judges; nor did he think it would be well that criminal jurisdiction should be subordinated to the civil jurisdiction, and that the former should be exercised by the judges of inferior dignity. (Hear, hear.)

Sir G. BOWYER moved the adjournment of the debate; but the motion was negatived without a division, and the subject dropped.

The House went into committee on the Beer Licences (Ireland) Bill, and progress was immediately reported.

Sir M. HICKS BEACH moved that the committee on the sale of Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill should consist of seventeen members, and that Mr. Ion Hamilton and Mr. O'Shaughnessy should be added.

This was agreed to.

CONTINGENT REMAINDERS AMENDMENT ACT 1877.

AN ACT for the Amendment of the Law with respect to Contingent Remainders.

1. This Act may be cited as "The Contingent Remainders Amendment Act 1877."

2. This Act shall commence and come into operation on the 1st Jan. 1878, and shall apply only to instruments executed on or after that date, and to wills and codicils revived or republished by any will or codicil executed on or after that date.

3. A contingent remainder of an estate of freehold shall, if not otherwise invalid, take effect in possession, notwithstanding the want of a particular estate of freehold to support it, in the same manner as it would have taken effect if it had been a contingent remainder of an equitable estate, supported by an outstanding legal estate in fee simple. And in like manner a contingent remainder of a copyhold or customary estate shall, if not otherwise invalid, take effect in possession notwithstanding the want of a particular copyhold or customary estate of freehold to support it.

4. The legal estate, in the meantime and until such taking effect in possession as aforesaid, shall, if not otherwise disposed of, result to the settlor and his heirs, or customary heirs, as the case may be, as part of his old estate, or, if the contingent remainder be created by a will or codicil, to the heirs or customary heirs of the testator or other stock of descent, according to the rules of inheritance.

5. The rules as to invalidity by reason of remoteness which now govern contingent remainders of equitable estates shall govern contingent remainders of legal estates, both freehold and copyhold or customary.

THE JUDICATURE ACTS.

THE following is a copy of the resolution proposed by Mr. Marten, Q.C., M.P., which formed the subject of discussion in the House of Commons on Friday evening, Feb. 23:—

"With a view to facilitate the transaction of business in the High Court of Justice, it is expedient that the following provisions should be adopted:

1. That the office of Chief Judge in Bankruptcy should be separated from the office of Vice-Chancellor, and that the business of the winding-up of companies should be transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy; and that an additional judge of the Chancery Division should be appointed, who should take business set down before the Master of the Rolls, such additional judge to act as Chief

Judge in Bankruptcy until a separate judge in bankruptcy is appointed:

2. That a moderate fee for hearing before the official referees should be substituted for the present high rate of fees, so as to allow of the full advantage being obtained by the public of the institution under recent legislation of official referees:

3. That the jurisdiction of the County Courts be extended, so that the limit of pecuniary amount may be the same in common law as in equity:

4. That with regard to criminal business the principle of the constitution of the Central Criminal Court should be applied throughout England and Wales, and that criminal business requiring the presence of a judge of the High Court of Justice should be taken in connection with the local quarter sessions, and that a revision should be made of the classes of cases proper to be tried before judges of the High Court of Justice and before the Court of Quarter Sessions respectively, so that only the gravest cases may be reserved for trial before the judges of the High Court:

5. That, as regards civil business on circuit, there should be one list of cases for the circuit, each case entered being marked on the list for the place where the trial is desired, and the judge of the High Court proceeding from place to place as the amount of the business at each place permits; and that commission days for civil business be abolished:

6. That, so far as practicable, arrangements should be made for simultaneous sittings at Guildhall and at Westminster for the trial of civil cases."

JUSTICES' CLERKS BILL.

A BILL to Amend the Law with respect to the Appointment, Payment, and Fees of Clerks of Justices of the Peace and Clerks of Special and Petty Sessions.

WHEREAS by section nine of the Act, of the session of the fourteenth and fifteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-five, intituled "An Act to amend the law relating to the expenses of prosecutions, and to make further provision for the apprehension and trial of offenders in certain cases," (in this Act referred to as "the principal Act,") it is provided that one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State (in this Act referred to as a Secretary of State), upon the recommendation of the justices, council, or other governing body as therein mentioned, (in this Act referred to as "the local authority,") may, by order, direct that the clerks of special and petty sessions and the clerks of justices of the peace within the jurisdiction of such local authority, or any of such clerks, are to be paid by salaries in lieu of fees and other payments, and fix the amount of salary so to be paid:

And whereas by the same Act the Secretary of State is authorised, on the recommendation of the local authority as therein mentioned, to order that certain business specified in the recommendation should not be included in fixing the salary of any clerk, and that such clerk should be paid for that business (in this Act referred to as accepted business), by fees and not by salary:

And whereas it is expedient to provide that all the said clerks should be paid by salary in lieu of fees, and to provide for the qualification, appointment, and fees of the said clerks:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. This Act may be cited as the Justices Clerks Act 1877.

2. Where at the passing of this Act an order under the principal Act is not in force for the payment by salary in lieu of fees of any clerk of special or petty sessions or clerk of justices of the peace within the jurisdiction of any local authority, that local authority shall, as soon as may be after the passing of this Act, and in any case before the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, make a recommendation to a Secretary of State in pursuance of the principal Act with respect to the payment of such clerk by salary in lieu of fees; and the Secretary of State shall make an order directing such payment; and if, in the case of any of the said clerks, such recommendation as enables a Secretary of State to make an order under the principal Act is not received by the Secretary of State before the said first day of February, the Secretary of State shall, in like manner (so nearly as circumstances admit) as if such recommendation had been duly made, make an order under the principal Act, directing the payment of such clerk by salary in lieu of fees for all business (other than the business of giving copies of depositions if that business is excepted by the order) and fixing the amount of the salary.

Every such salary may, if it is thought fit, be made to vary according to the number of cases or amount of business.

Subject as aforesaid, every such salary shall be deemed to accrue from day to day, and shall be paid quarterly or at such less intervals as may be from time to time fixed by the local authority.

3. Where at the passing of this Act an order is in force under the principal Act for the payment of any clerk of special or petty sessions or clerk of justices of the peace by salary in lieu of fees, but an order has been made that such clerk should be paid for certain excepted business (other than that of giving copies of depositions) by fees and not by salary, this Act shall, so far as is consistent with the tenour thereof, apply, as regards the fees for the excepted business, in like manner as it applies where an order is not in force for the payment of a clerk by salary in lieu of fees.

Where any such clerk as aforesaid is, in pursuance of any Act of Parliament (other than the principal Act), paid by salary in lieu of fees, either for all business, or for all business other than that of giving copies of depositions, that clerk shall continue to be paid by salary in lieu of fees for all such business, and a recommendation need not be made with respect to such clerk in pursuance of this Act.

4. In each petty sessional division there shall after the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, or any later date at which an order for the payment of a clerk by salary in lieu of fees comes into operation in the division, be only one salaried clerk in the division to perform the duties of clerk of petty sessions, clerk of special sessions, or clerk of any justice or justices of the peace;

Provided that—

(1) Where special and petty sessions are usually held at more than one place appointed for the purpose in a petty sessional division, there may, if it seem fit, be a separate salaried clerk appointed in respect of each such place; and

(2) A secretary of state, on the application of the local authority, may, if he thinks fit, authorise in any case the appointment of more than one salaried clerk.

The salaried clerk (in this Act referred to as a clerk of a petty sessional division) shall be appointed from time to time by the justices acting in and for the petty sessional division in which he is clerk assembled in special sessions, and shall hold his office during the pleasure of those justices.

Where there is a salaried clerk of a petty sessional division, any fees which may be received by a clerk of special sessions, clerk of petty sessions, or clerk of a justice of the peace in that division, shall not be received by such clerk for his own use, but shall be received, paid, and accounted for as directed by section 11 of the principal Act, or by any Act specially relating to such clerk.

Nothing in this section shall apply to, or to the fees of, either a clerk of a metropolitan police court, or clerk of the justices of a borough, or a clerk to a stipendiary or other magistrate whose salary is regulated under any Act of Parliament other than the principal Act.

5. Every clerk appointed after the passing of this Act to be a salaried clerk of a petty sessional division, or to be clerk to the justices of a borough, shall either—

(1) Be a solicitor to the Supreme Court of Judicature; or,
(2) Have served for not less than seven years as a clerk to a police or stipendiary magistrate, or to a metropolitan police court; or
(3) Have served for not less than seven years as, or as assistant to, either a clerk of a petty sessional division, or a clerk to the justices of a borough, or (in the case of service before the passing of this Act) a clerk of special or petty sessions, or a clerk of a justice or justices of the peace.

6. Whereas by sect. 30 of the Act of the session of the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, c. 43, intituled "An Act to facilitate the performance of the duties of justices of the peace out of sessions within England and Wales with respect to summary convictions and orders," provision is made for the making of tables of the fees to be paid to the clerks of special and petty sessions, and to the clerks of justices of the peace, and it is expedient to make such further provision as is hereinafter mentioned concerning the same; be it therefore enacted as follows:

The said sect. 30 is hereby repealed so far as relates to clerks of special and petty sessions and clerks of justices of the peace without prejudice to anything done in pursuance of that section.

Where it appears to a local authority that the aggregate amount received by the treasurer of that authority in respect of court fees unduly exceeds or unduly falls below the aggregate amount paid by that authority by way of salary to the clerks of petty sessional divisions, or in the case of a borough to the clerk to the justices of the borough, or that otherwise it is expedient so to do, the local authority may make a table of the court fees which in their opinion should be taken, and shall cause such table, signed by the chairman, mayor, or other presiding officer of the local authority, to be laid before a Secretary of State, and a Secretary of State may, if he think fit, alter such table of fees and settle the same (having due regard to the relation of the aggregate amounts so received and paid as aforesaid), and certify that the fees in the table as settled by him are proper to be taken within the jurisdiction of the said local authority.

Where complaint is made to a Secretary of State that the aggregate amount received by the treasurer of a local authority in respect of court fees unduly exceeds or unduly falls below the aggregate amount paid by that authority by way of salary as aforesaid, he may, if he think fit, by order, require the local authority to make a return to him within the time specified in the order of the aggregate amount so received and paid during three years previous to the order, and if, on receiving such return, or on the failure of the local authority to make the return, he is, after making such inquiry as he think proper, satisfied of the truth of the complaint, he may, by order, require the local authority to make and lay before him, within the time (not being less than four months from the date of the order) specified in the order, a table of court fees in pursuance of this section, and if the local authority fail to comply with the order, he may, in like manner (so nearly as circumstances admit) as if the local authority had laid before him a table of fees in pursuance of this section, settle a table of fees and certify that the fees in that table are proper to be taken within the jurisdiction of the said local authority.

A secretary of state, upon certifying a table of fees in pursuance of this section, shall cause copies thereof to be sent to the clerk of the local authority to be by him distributed to the clerks of petty sessions divisions and clerks to justices within the jurisdiction of that authority, and if at any time thereafter any of those clerks, or any other person, demands or receives any other or greater court fee than such as is set down in the said table, he shall forfeit, for every such demand or receipt, twenty pounds, to be recovered by action of debt in the High Court of Justice by any person who will sue for the same.

Until a table is made in pursuance of this section, any of the said clerks may demand and receive such fees as he is at the passing of this Act lawfully authorised to demand and receive.

The expression "court fee" in this section means any fee, gratuity, or sum which may by law be demanded or received in respect of any business or act transacted or done by a clerk of special or petty sessions or a clerk of justices of the peace as such clerk, notwithstanding that by reason of such clerk being paid by salary, or of the provisions of this Act, he cannot receive the same for his own use, and includes fees for the giving of copies of depositions by any clerk mentioned in this section, whether received for his own use or not.

7. This Act shall, so far as is consistent with the tenour thereof, be construed as one with the principal Act; and so much of sects. 9 and 10 of the principal Act as empowers a Secretary of State to direct that a clerk be paid by fees in lieu of salary (either generally or in respect of exempted business), is hereby repealed.

NOTES ON THE COUNTY COURTS BILL.

It is no doubt very well known that Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, the learned Judge of County Court Circuit No. 1, is the author of the County Courts Jurisdiction Bill, 1877 (which we published in our issue of the 17th ult., page 276), in the sense that the learned gentleman drafted it upon the lines recommended by the Judicature Commissioners, in their second report, of which body Mr. Bradshaw was the secretary. We hope the following not altogether unfriendly criticisms on the Bill will prove interesting as reflecting the aims and purposes of the proposed measure, which will, no doubt, receive that attention at the hands of members of the House of Commons, whether sycophants or lawyers, which it thoroughly deserves:—

The scope and intent of the measure is to establish at certain convenient centres intermediate courts, that is, courts occupying a position between the existing County Courts and the High Court of Justice.

It may be expected that the Bill will have the support of the great towns whose interests are involved, of the provincial law societies, of the chambers of commerce, of the country solicitors, and merchants and traders generally, for its practical object is to give the mercantile classes and others in the localities indicated facilities, which at present they do not possess, for the settlement of their disputes locally, and without the cost and delay necessarily attendant on litigation in the Supreme Court of Judicature. It is in effect a Bill for promoting free trade in law; sections 14, 15, 16, are an illustration of this.

No better proof can be given of the want of such courts in the great centres of trade than the popularity of the Mayor's Court of London, the Court of Passage at Liverpool, and the Salford Hundred Court at Manchester, though each of these tribunals is open to very serious objections.

It is well known that several of the judges of the Supreme Court are strongly in favour of changes in the direction pointed to by the Bill; partly it may be on general grounds, and from favour to the principle of local jurisdictions; but mainly it cannot be doubted from a practical desire to get something done to relieve the block in their own courts and offices, which is caused in a great measure by causes of a comparatively unimportant character, which would be much better tried locally, and which occupy at present an amount of valuable time of the judges of the Supreme Court which is wholly disproportioned to their merits.

It is in this direction that a remedy for the congestion in the courts and offices in London is to be sought; it is in this direction only that an effectual remedy is to be found. Common sense and experience say, distribute the business. Let the principle of distribution be adopted so far as relates to the administration of the law; but concentration also has its uses, and is necessary for control, for appeal, for the authoritative exposition and settlement of the law.

Many of the proposals of the Bill as to changes in the existing county court system, for example, the establishment of central courts with enlarged districts, the extension and equalisation of the various jurisdictions, uniformity in matters of appeal, reduction of the number of county court judges in certain districts, and giving limited judicial functions to registrars, are proposals which have the authority of the judicature commissioners in their second report. It is true that the Lord Chancellor (Cairns) did not sign that report, but though his dissent from certain portions of it relating to alterations in the circuits of the superior judges caused him to withhold his signature, he expressly reserved his approval (in a note to the report) of the greater part of its recommendations as to changes in the county court system.

When Lord Selborne, C., introduced the Judicature Act, 1873, into the House of Lords, he stated that he did not propose to give effect to the recommendations of the commissioners in their second report, that the county courts should be made constituent parts of the Supreme Court of Judicature; nevertheless he carefully avoided expressing any intention not to give effect to the recommendations of the commissioners for giving extended jurisdiction to the county courts, subject to a power of removal into the High Court of Justice. But, apart from this negative inference, Lord Selborne may be claimed as a supporter of the principle of the Bill, as having signed, without qualification, the second report of the commissioners.

There are therefore practical reasons justifying the introduction of such a measure, and there is high and weighty authority for its main proposals.

Jurists would probably prefer, instead of increasing the jurisdiction of the County Court, that district courts, branches of the High Court of Justice, should be established. But in the first place it is more than doubtful if the House of Commons would listen to a private member, even though supported by the chambers of commerce and local law societies of the great towns interested, who should attempt at this early stage to take upon himself to amend the Judicature Acts; and, besides, it is absolutely certain that no private member of sufficient mark and standing to move the introduction of the Bill would consent to undertake such a duty. That is for the Government, if thought desirable. The Bill may be remodelled in that direction without much difficulty, if the Lord Chancellor thinks fit. But if the Government are willing to assist, or to allow the passing of the Bill in its present or any modified form, as a tentative measure, it does not require the gift of prophecy to pronounce that within a very few sessions the true scientific principle of a great national court of justice, which so many jurists have looked forward to, and longed to see, will for the first time be embodied in English legislation since the Norman centralizing spirit drove out the Saxon local jurisdictions; and that the courts constituted by this Bill, and others it may be, will, in such manner as a larger experience shall suggest, become and be united to the Supreme Court of Judicature as integral parts or branches of that court, thus combining all the advantages of a local administration of justice with and under a central authority.

Opposition to the measure may be anticipated from two classes of person: First, from those who honestly on public grounds advocate a policy of parsimony with regard to all expenditure on the administration of justice; and, secondly, from those who think their individual interests may be imperilled or prejudiced by any interference with the existing order of things.

With the first-named class no arguments will avail, but such as show that some saving will be effected, either presently or in the immediate future; or, at any rate, that no further burthen will be laid on the national Exchequer. Even these economists will find some difficulty on their own principles in withholding their approval and co-operation, when they have the figures placed before them. They are well worth examination and careful study.

Speaking roundly, the receipts into the Exchequer—payments by suitors, as fees in respect of proceedings in the courts comprised in the bill—amounted in 1875 to £142,000.

That includes the fees received by the registrars for their own use.

Thus:—Fees paid into the Exchequer .....	£125,501
Fees taken by registrars for their own use .....	16,505
That is what the suitors paid in 1875 for the use of the courts comprised in the Bill .....	£142,006
The charge during the same period, being salaries of registrars .....	£24,744
Fees taken by registrars (as above) .....	16,505

Surplus £109,357

So that in round numbers there would be a sum exceeding £90,000 available for payment into the exchequer, as an actual surplus arising from the courts comprised in the Bill, subject only to the charges of audit and for the high bailiff's department, which there are no means of ascertaining, but which cannot be very large.

Besides this, however, there will also be a considerable prospective saving, if parliament could approve the proposals of the Bill as to superseding gradually, and as vacancies occur, the existing registrars, and transferring their duties to the judicial registrars; while at the same time the administration of the courts, which is the first and paramount consideration, would be equally efficient.

The great towns are becoming enlightened in respect of these matters; they are gradually becoming aware of the enormous load of taxation laid upon them, and which they are called on to pay for a purpose no doubt in itself admirable, namely, the bringing justice home to the doors of divers persons living in the sparsely populated agricultural districts, but with whom they have no connexion whatever, and they think they are only demanding bare justice—the supposition that they are to continue to pay the oppressive fees that produce such results—if they ask that a portion of them shall be applied to make provision for their own wants and requirements.

Under the head of salaries and travelling allowances to be paid to the judges there will be a small immediate deficiency, owing to the pensions proposed by the Bill; but this, as the pensioned judges die out, will gradually be converted into a small eventual surplus; and as six of the judges were appointed in 1847, and have therefore served for upwards of thirty years in a judicial office, it is to be hoped that the House of Commons will not grudge their well-earned retirement. Opposition on this score is scarcely to be apprehended even from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who may satisfy himself, if he will be at the trouble to inquire for their baptismal certificates, that their pensions need not unnecessarily trouble him.

The Bill will affect—

Judges of existing county courts .....	20
Of these it proposes to do away with seven; six pensioned judges, and one death (a) vacancy not to be filled up .....	7
It removes into the courts vacated by the pensioned judges .....	6
It creates new judges .....	7

There will, therefore, be under the new arrangements seven judges less than under the existing arrangements.

Existing charge:

Assuming that the six judges appointed in 1847 are willing to retire, their salaries and travelling allowances, taken together, amount to .....	£11,400
The remaining fourteen judges' salaries and allowances (say) .....	25,000
	£36,400

(a) The death vacancies for the six years 1871-76 inclusive, average 3½ per annum.

Proposed charge:

7 principal County Court judges' salaries and allowances .....	£21,000
6 County Court judges' salaries and allowances (say) .....	10,200
1 death vacancy not to be filled up .....	9,000
6 pensioned judges .....	9,000
20
Deficiency .....	£25,000
To be reduced as the pensions fall in .....	9,000
Eventual surplus .....	£4,000

The proposed charge is calculated on the assumption that the seven principal County Court judges would be selected in the first instance from the body of the existing County Court judges.

The members of the Bar and the London solicitors are the persons pointed to in the second class of those above referred to as probable opponents of the measure. To them it must be made absolutely clear that there is no sort of intention to create a local quasi superior court to compete with the assizes.

The principal County Courts will, in the opinion of persons most competent to form a judgment, have plenty of substantial business of their own; and if that is disposed of by them sufficiently to the satisfaction of the profession and the public to attract business of a more important character, if, to use a homely illustration, people choose to come to the shop for more costly and valuable articles owing to the excellence of its ordinary staple, no one can justly complain.

As things are at present, those only who are practically acquainted with the fact can tell what a muddle a great County Court presents, with its small debt cases and its more important business, more or less unassorted and mixed up together.

It may not be generally known that while the judge is sitting solemnly in court trying the most trumpery disputes, which as the law now stands the registrar cannot try, involving it may be a few shillings in a tradesman's account, the registrar is not unfrequently hearing under the judge's delegation an argument on some nice point of bankruptcy law, in which many hundreds of pounds may be at stake.

Then the remanets, and the costs of them to the suitors. The judge of County Courts who has a mixed circuit, comprising a large court and several smaller ones, lives in a state of perpetual drive. No sooner does he get well into his cause list at one place than he finds the time approaching when he is due at some other place, and there he has to go, leaving perhaps part heard and important causes behind him. It may be, and often is the case, that at the court whither he is thus bound to go there is next to nothing for him to do, absolutely not a single case that could not be equally well disposed of by a registrar, or that requires for its decision anything resembling judicial qualities.

No greater or more unseemly waste of judicial power can well be imagined. It can be compared to nothing so well as the proceedings of the Circumlocution Office. But the cost to the suitors is no laughing matter. Surely such anomalies require only to be stated in order to be corrected. How and in what manner a remedy is to be applied is not so important. It is not a question of names, if the substance can be obtained.

The bill proposes a method of concentration and distribution of the business at once simple and effectual. It substantially redresses the existing anomalies; it meets the practical want of the great towns for a decent and dignified intermediate court for the settlement of their disputes locally; and it has the merit of coming before the House of Commons with the sanction of the Judicature Commissioners for its main proposals.

The reparation of the more important business will be effectually made if the judicial registrar has a primary jurisdiction to dispose of the small debt cases.

To the objection raised by Mr. Gainsford Bruce, who is a friendly critic, and whose opinion deserves weight, both on his own account and as representing the opinion of the junior Bar, that it is undesirable to give judicial functions to registrars, as a small judge is a great evil, the simple and conclusive answer seems to be, that registrars of County Courts, who are not judicial registrars but solicitors for the most part in actual practice in their districts, do in fact now exercise far more extensive judicial functions than it is proposed to confer upon the judicial registrars.

Indeed the bill will operate in two ways to check and curtail these powers, by setting the judges at liberty and making it their duty to attend to the more important matters, and by confining the jurisdiction of the judicial registrars to small cases of debt or damage, or to matters which are ministerial only.

The judges are to retain all the special jurisdictions conferred upon the County Courts, except in proceedings specially designed for the protection of the poorer classes, as for example, proceedings under the Friendly Societies Acts, and even here there is a liberal power of rehearing by the judge.

If the Schedule (B.) of excepted jurisdictions be examined, it will be found that everything that could possibly present any difficulty is by the Bill itself withdrawn from the cognizance of the judicial registrars; and it will of course be to their interest to transfer everything of any real importance to the judge, so as to relieve themselves from responsibility; and this it may be hoped will be a sufficient safeguard against difficult cases being disposed of by incompetent persons.

It will perhaps be objected to the proposed concentration of business at principal County Courts that expenses may be increased by the parties and their witnesses having to travel greater distances. That this may be so in some cases is possible. But we are told, these are the words of the Judicature Commissioners, 2nd Rep. p. 18, founded on the evidence they had taken: "We are told, and are satisfied that there are at present important matters tried at County Courts in small towns where there are no advocates, and that the cost of bringing them specially from a distance more than outweighs the expense of taking the parties and their witnesses to the place where the advocates exercise their profession. Bearing in mind the vast addition made to the means of communication by railways since the County Courts were established, and the greater power of classification and arrangement of causes that will exist if our recommendations are adopted, we doubt if the expenses of the parties to such causes will be increased."

As to salary, if the judicial registrar is to relieve the judge from the labour of travelling, he is to be fairly paid, looking to the routine and ministerial nature of his duties. But it will be seen that the judge has to provide the brains and higher qualifications. Indeed the judge will have no sinecure. It is calculated that he would sit about 200 days in the year, and on many of these days he would have still to travel considerable distances. Par. 2 of section 20 is intended really and truly to bring justice home to every man's door by enabling the judge when cases arise in which a personal view of the locus in quo is desirable, or when delicate, or aged, or very numerous witnesses reside in the locality where the cause of action arises, to go to the cause instead of bringing the cause to the centre where he ordinarily sits.

It is to be hoped that public opinion would compel the judges to give full effect to this provision, but it is impossible to insert in the Bill a compulsory clause providing for all cases.

Enough has been said to show that if the powers conferred upon the judges of the principal County Courts of hearing causes for any special reason at places which are not centres are honestly exercised, the expenses will be considerable; and, to the extent to which the suitors are relieved these expenses will have to be paid by the judge out of his own pocket. Perhaps this may help to neutralise opposition to the proposed increase in their salaries. But the fact, though it may not yet have attracted the attention of Parliament, that registrars of County Courts are now receiving remuneration exceeding and in some cases largely exceeding the salaries paid to the judges of these courts, will speak for itself to the House of Commons.

If it be objected that the proposed scheme is too partial, too tentative, the answer is that this is deliberately done. The requirements of the different parts of the country are not the same. The same kind of courts are not wanted in the agricultural districts as are wanted in Leeds, Birmingham, Bristol, and other such places, where far more important and complicated questions are constantly being raised. Indeed the crucial mistake hitherto in the legislation for the County Courts has been its uniformity. The plains of Northumberland and the bucolic districts of Bucks are treated precisely on the same footing as Leeds and Newcastle; yet nothing can well be imagined more diverse than their respective requirements. Further, it may be said that this is deliberately done in the interests of public economy. Here again the recommendations of the Judicature Commissioners may be cited, 2nd Rep. p. 20: "In order to avoid claims for compensation, we recommend that power be given to make alterations from time to time as vacancies arise. The system may be adopted gradually."

It is upon the wise and tentative basis thus laid down that the measure is framed. It is proposed to constitute principal County Courts at certain centres where changes in the direction indicated by the Bill are confessedly very much wanted. If the experiment is successful, if it should be found in practice to work well, it may be extended by degrees (sect. 4) by Her Majesty's Orders in Council; while the House of Commons retains its constitutional control, reserving to itself (section 6) power over the salaries of the judges.

If it be objected that the jurisdiction conferred by the Bill upon the judges of principal County Courts is very large, the answer is, that the County Court judges already have this jurisdiction.

In common law matters, by consent of the parties to the litigation, they have jurisdiction unlimited by the amount of the claim.

In equity matters, so far as that jurisdiction is at present conferred upon the County Courts, and in bankruptcy, they have and exercise at present all the powers and jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court of Chancery. And for a further answer it may be said, let fit judges be appointed. The field of choice is ample. If men in the body of the County Court judges are not deemed eligible, barristers of ten years' standing, from whose ranks the judges of the Supreme Courts are recruited, will be available. Indeed it seems very desirable that the persons appointed to preside over the principal County Courts should be taken from the class which supplies judges to the Supreme Court. They ought to be the best men obtainable. Their qualification is to be precisely the same as that of the judges of the Supreme Court. They should rank accordingly. The position proposed for them is that formerly assigned to the Bankruptcy Commissioners, whose provincial jurisdiction they have inherited, in addition to all their own other jurisdictions. It is believed that the country would command the services of men in every way qualified for 3000 a year, the salary paid to the Railway Commissioners, and especially if marked judicial excellence were from time to time to be rewarded by promotion to the superior Bench. The judges of the principal County Courts should be no otherwise below or inferior to the judges of the High Court of Justice than those judges are below the judges of the Court of Appeal; but they would necessarily reside in their circuits, they would be stationary, and far less expensive.

Since the legislation of last session the single judge system is the one appointed by Parliament for courts of first instance; and by this enactment the last plausible objection to the large jurisdiction proposed by the Bill to be conferred upon the judges of principal County Courts seems to be removed.

If mistakes occur, as they must and will occur, the decisions and orders of the judges of these courts will be subject to appeal and correction precisely in the same way as those of the judges of the High Court of Justice now are under the Judicature Acts. It may, however, be open to consideration whether, in order to avoid multiplicity of appeals, the appeal from the principal County Courts should not go at once to the Court of Appeal, just as the appeal from the registrar in bankruptcy, when sitting for the Chief Judge, goes direct to the Lords Justices.

The only matter remaining to be touched on is the precedence and increase of salary proposed to be given to the judges of County Courts under sect. 24. This section is no doubt a rider to the main purposes of the Bill. It seeks to give effect to the public opinion, so strongly expressed last year in the press, as to the claims of the County Court judges for an increase of salary, especially as their labours and responsibilities will be much increased by sect. 17 of the Bill.

Now, putting aside all consideration for the judges themselves, it may be confidently asserted that the interests of justice suffer by the want of an official recognised status of the County Court judges. It is far more difficult to keep order in an ordinary County Court than at quarter sessions, and this may and undoubtedly is to be attributed to the deference paid to the recognised status of the magistrates. The judge in the County Court finds himself addressed in all manner of ways, from "My Lord," to "I say, Mr.," or "Good gentleman," a want of uniformity which is not conducive to the dignity or even decency of the tribunal. And it must be borne in mind, if the objection is made, that there are very few County Court judges in London. Their number is scattered all over the country in units, so that the serjeants and Queen's counsel need not fear swamping. But the precise place in the table of precedence is not so important, as that, both as regards themselves and the public, in the interests of justice itself, it is desirable that the County Court judges should have some defined and ascertained rank assigned to them.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

Inquiries, as to Students' Societies, as to the several Examinations, as to Admission on the Roll of the Supreme Court, as to being called to the Bar, and as to taking out and renewal of annual certificates, should be addressed to the Editor (Students' Department).

We commend to country law societies of solicitors the action of the Nottingham Incorporated Law Society, the governing body of which has decided to establish a local prize in connection with the final examination of gentlemen articled in the county of Nottingham. This is an example which might well be followed throughout the country. The chance of winning a local prize must operate as an additional incentive to students.

It will be seen from a report in another column that the Nottingham Law Students' Society has recently had for the first time a joint debate with a "non-legal" debating society in the town. We hope that other law students' societies will arrange similar debates, as they must be of great advantage to students, who thus meet new opponents and new friends. We gather from the report that there was a large attendance of visitors on the occasion.

An examination certificate is only available for admission on the roll of the Supreme Court within six months from its date, and must otherwise be specially enlarged by an order of the Master of the Rolls, which should be applied for at the Petty Bag Office.

We are pleased to notice that the United Law Students' Society is taking steps to found a law library. The following appears in a circular which has been issued by the committee of the society to the Profession: "It has been decided to establish a circulating law library in connection with the society, and the committee venture to call the attention of the Profession, and others interested in the furtherance of legal education, to the undertaking as one likely to be of practical utility and deserving of support. To establish and successfully maintain such a library, must necessarily entail considerable expense, and the committee feel that, considering the benefit such an undertaking will confer, and the much felt want it will supply, they may venture to appeal to the Profession generally, and to legal authors in particular, for help in carrying out the proposed scheme. All books and pamphlets, &c., of a legal character, will be gladly received, addressed to Frank B. Moyle, honorary librarian, Clement's-inn

"A library of any value cannot be formed day or a year, but we hope the appeal to the session for assistance and encouragement will be made in vain. There are many articles who have no entrance to the library of the Incorporated Law Society, and to whom such an tuition as that proposed will be of much value.

following lectures and classes are appointed delivered and held in the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, during the following week: Monday, Equity Class, 4.30 to 6 p.m.; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, ditto; Wednesday class in Conveyancing has been continued, and gentlemen who have hitherto decided on that day should transfer themselves to Monday or Tuesday class; Thursday, lecture on conveyancing, 6 to 7 o'clock p.m. Subscribers not admitted to the hall after lectures have ended.

In recent inquiries we gather that the Examiners of the Law Institution consider that the articles expire between 10th Jan. and 15th, candidates may be examined in January, between 14th April and 22nd May, candidates be examined in April; if between 21st May and 2nd Nov., in June, and if between 1st Nov. and 11th Jan., in November: or, of course, any subsequent examination. Six weeks at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of month of examination.

For the final examination, and notices for motion on the roll of solicitors can be renewed one week from the end of the month, for such original notices have respectively been. For further information see the Regulations of November 1875 (third Schedule). We intend that the examiners consider that this applies where articles of clerkship have expired. In this view we cannot, however, concur. Regulations in question do not seem to admit of such restriction.

Articles of clerkship, or assignments of articles of clerkship, dated on any day during March, be enrolled and registered at the Petty Bag on or before the same days in the month of March next, and when articles or assignments are required to be, and are, enrolled and registered any day during the month of March, they must be produced and entered at the Law Institution before the same day of the month of June. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 8 and 9, and 23 & 24 c. 127, s. 7. Failure to comply with these requirements often entails a loss of time to the articles students.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of the above society was held in the secretary's office, 2, Lawson-street, on Tuesday evening, the 27th ult., Mr. Frank Taylor, solicitor, in the chair, when a discussion took place as to whether the following guarantee was a continuing one:—"Mr. John Jones, wholesale butcher.—If you will let my son, Tom, have some meat I will see you paid £50.—James Smith, farmer." Mr. H. Walker argued for the affirmative, and Mr. S. Jeavons for the negative. It was argued, for the affirmative, that as Tom Smith was commencing business as a retail butcher, it was the intention of the parties to help him on until he got into a fair way of business, and therefore the guarantee was a continuing one, and in support, Sheffield v. Meadows, (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 595), and other cases were quoted. For the negative, it was argued that the word "some," and not "any," being used in the document, and considering the vagueness of its wording, it was intended that the transaction should be limited to one delivery of meat only, and in support of this argument Mayer v. Isaac (6 M. & W. 605, 612) and other cases were quoted. The chairman having summed up, the question was put to the meeting, and the votes being equal on both sides, the chairman gave his casting vote in favour of the negative.

HUDDERSFIELD LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

A GENERAL meeting of this society was held on Monday evening last, at the County Court House, Queen-street, presided over by Mr. J. A. Slater, B.A. There was a very good attendance of members.

The honorary secretary, Mr. James Yeoman, announced that the United Law Students' Society of London had determined to offer an annual prize of the value of five guineas for the competition of members of societies in the union, the Huddersfield Society amongst the number; the prize to be awarded to the writer of the best essay on some legal subject to be selected by the committee. He was informed that the subject selected for that year's competition was, "The Law in Relation to the Property of Married Women."

The provisions of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act of last year were then explained by Mr. J. Priestley, solicitor.

A discussion having taken place on the statute, and on Mr. Priestley's comments thereon,

The Chairman called upon Mr. Crook, solicitor, to move the following proposition:

"That local representative authorities should be empowered to acquire within their respective districts, on payment of fair compensation, all vested interests in the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors, and, if they think fit, to carry on the trade for the convenience and on behalf of the inhabitants."

Mr. Crook was supported in his contention by Mr. J. W. Piercy, and opposed by Mr. R. Welsh, solicitor.

The subject, one of great interest and importance, evoked one of the most successful debates of the session. The proposition was ultimately negatived by the casting vote of the chairman.

HULL LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AN ordinary meeting was held on the 27th Feb., when a discussion took place on the following subject:—"Ought a member of Parliament to vote according to his own opinion rather than in accordance with that of the majority of his constituency?" Messrs. Winter, Hobson, Priestman, and Wilson spoke in favour of the affirmative, and the opposition was conducted by Messrs. West and Watson.

NOTTINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AN ordinary meeting of this society was held at the Grand Jury Room, Town Hall, Nottingham, on Friday evening, 23rd Feb. 1877, C. L. Rothera, Esq., vice-president, in the chair. The secretary read a letter from Mr. A. Williams, secretary of the Nottingham Incorporated Law Society, announcing that the council of that society had resolved to establish a local prize in connection with the final examination. The prize (which will be of the value of £5 5s.) will be given to every articled clerk obtaining honorary mention at his examination, provided that he has served two-thirds of his term of service within the town or county of Nottingham, and is under the age of twenty-six at the time of his examination. Upon which it was unanimously resolved, upon the motion of the secretary, seconded by Mr. Perry, "That the thanks of this society, as representing a large number of articled clerks in Nottingham, be given to the Nottingham Incorporated Law Society for the interest shown by them in the welfare of such articled clerks by the gift of a prize of competition at the final examination." The question for the evening's discussion—"That parish churchyards are national property, and ought to be thrown open for the burial according to their own rites of persons of all denominations"—was opened by Mr. W. H. Stevenson, who was opposed by Mr. Wyles, and supported by Messrs. Barber, Johnstone, A. Bright, J. Bright, Blake, and Warner. Mr. Wyles was supported by Messrs. Burton, Woodhouse, and A. J. Stevenson. The question on being put to the vote was decided in the affirmative by seven votes to five. There were fifteen members of the society present.

Also, on Friday evening, 23rd Feb. 1877, a debate was held between this society and the Nottingham Union Debating Society (a society composed of gentlemen, none of whom are members of the legal profession). The chair was taken by J. W. Lewis, Esq. There was a large attendance of the members of the two societies, and about forty ladies and gentlemen, who were admitted by ticket. The question appointed for discussion was "That it is advisable to establish universal compulsory military service in England." The question was to be supported by the Law Students' Society, and opposed by the Union Debating Society. The following were the rules to be observed in the debate:—1. Four members, selected from each society, shall open the discussion. 2. The first eight speakers shall not be limited in point of time; but it is understood that they shall confine their remarks to a reasonable quarter of an hour, and each following speaker shall be allowed ten minutes. 3. At the conclusion of the debate, one of the openers for the Law Students' Society shall be allowed to reply. 4. No reading, except by way of quotation or reference, shall be allowed. 5. Visitors, as well as members of the societies, shall be allowed to vote on the question, and the voting shall be by show of hands. 6. All points of order and the like shall be left to the discretion of the chairman.

The chairman having opened the meeting, Mr. Hodgson, of the Law Students' Society, introduced the discussion. He was followed by Mr. F. Bradley, of the Union Debating Society, and after that the members of the two societies spoke alternately. Besides the eight speakers who had been appointed to open the discussion, five other gentlemen spoke, and the debate was then adjourned to the evening of Monday, the 19th Feb. At the adjourned debate on the Monday evening there was again a large attendance of members of the contending societies, and about forty-five visitors, principally ladies. The debate was carried on by seven members of the Union Debating Society and six of the Law Students' Society, and, at the conclusion, Mr. W. H. Stevenson replied on behalf of the latter society. The chairman then put the question to the vote, and it was decided in the negative by 40 votes to 27. Mr. C. L. Rothera, vice-president of the Law Students' Society, in a few complimentary words, proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman for his kindness in presiding. This was seconded by Mr. C. H. Vickers, secretary of the Union Debating Society, and carried unanimously. The chairman, replying, expressed the pleasure that had been afforded to him by presiding, and the proceedings terminated. This is the second debate of this description which has been held between this society and the Union Debating Society. The former on the question, "That the power and influence of the aristocracy in the government of this country ought to be curtailed," was held on the 3rd and 6th March, 1876. Both these debates have been highly successful, and have been of much advantage to this society in giving the members an opportunity of speaking before larger and more critical audiences than they might otherwise have, and in enabling them to form by comparison a truer estimate of their own powers. It is to be hoped that the last of such debates has not been held.

PLYMOUTH, STONEHOUSE, AND DEVONPORT LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society, held at the Athenaeum, on Friday, Feb. 23rd, an imaginary motion at Nisi Prius was tried before the President (J. Shelly, Esq.) as judge, and a jury composed of five of the honorary and ordinary members of the society (Messrs. Wolferstan, A. Gard, Harrison, Oliver, and F. E. Bennett). The facts of the case were shortly as follows: The plaintiff (Mr. Chubb), supposed to have been a corn merchant, carrying on a large business at Gloucester, in November last obtained a contract for supplying corn at Plymouth, and started for that place on the 1st of Dec. Plaintiff had to travel over the lines of two railway companies, but when passing over the line of the second company the train in which he was travelling ran into a truck, which was being shunted in a station through which it should have run without stopping; the shock knocked plaintiff down, breaking two of his ribs and causing severe internal injuries, which have unfitted him for business, and caused him very serious loss. The plaintiff's claim was for £2000. Messrs. Guy and Helpman, instructed by C. Matthews, appeared for the plaintiff, Messrs. Riehard and Pugh, instructed by Mr. Caunter for the defendants. Plaintiff's witnesses were Messrs. Chubb (plaintiff), E. F. Fox, (passenger), M. W. Phillips (who saw the accident), and McLeman (doctor). Defendants' witnesses: Messrs. Snell (engine driver), Sparrow (stoker), Jackson (guard), France (guard), Symons (porter), and Lane (signalman). After the summing-up of the judge the jury retired to consider their verdict, which was for the plaintiff in £1500. The attendance at this meeting was larger than at any previous meeting of the society, there being thirty members present and upwards of seventy visitors. The trial was considered a great success, and it is hoped a similar one will be held in each session.

THE LEEDS LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

THIS society met at the Philosophical Hall on Monday, the 26th ult., when Mr. T. E. West, barrister, presided. "A. sends an offer by post to B. to sell him certain goods, B. accepts the offer by letter, and posts the letter. The letter is lost at the post office, and A. never receives it. A. having sold the goods to C., can B. sue A. for breach of contract?" was the subject of discussion. A large number of cases were cited, but the cases principally relied on were Dunlop v. Higgins (1 H. of L. Cas. 381) and In re Imperial Land Company of Marseilles (Harris's Case, 7 Ch. 587) in the affirmative, and the British and American Telegraph Company v. Colson (6 Exch. 108) in the negative. There was an animated discussion, and the question was decided in the affirmative by a majority of nine votes.

The best thanks of the meeting were voted to the chairman.

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AT the weekly meeting of this society, held at Clement's Inn Hall, Strand, on Wednesday, the 28th ult., the following subject was discussed: "That the law and custom of primogeniture are contrary to public policy." The debate was opened by Mr. Thornton, who dwelt upon the hardship done to the younger children by the present law, and argued that, though the doctrine was undoubtedly necessary to the feudal system, there were no just grounds for retaining it in modern times. The motion was opposed by Mr. Owen, upon the grounds that the dividing of the soil into small holdings was opposed to the agricultural interests of the country; that the present method of merely portioning younger children encouraged enterprise, and that the landed gentry formed a most useful element in our constitution. An animated debate ensued, in which a number of members joined. It was insisted that agriculture really suffered on account of the larger proprietors neglecting their property, which, in the hands of a small owner, would be carefully cultivated; that this system prevented a large body from having a stake in the country, and, while it maintained a few in luxury, was inequitable to the many. The motion was finally carried by a majority of nine; present thirty-five.

NOTES OF RECENT DECISIONS.

BASTARDY—ORDER OF AFFILIATION—CORROBORATIVE EVIDENCE.

THERE is no more embarrassing question with which justices at petty or quarter sessions have to deal than that which arises in affiliation cases, of what amounts to corroborative evidence. The woman's testimony is always clear and explicit enough. She has to declare that the defendant is the father of her child, and she is, of course, always ready with a plausible statement of the circumstances necessary to establish that fact. The law, however, is wisely jealous of allowing such evidence alone to establish paternity, and hence the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, s. 4 (which, in this particular, merely adopts the language of a former Act), enacts that an order of affiliation is to be made only "if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other evidence to the satisfaction of the said justices." In such cases it rarely occurs that there is any direct and positive corroborative evidence, the evidence usually being of essentially a circumstantial description, often most inconclusive, and very frequently capable of various interpretations. Upon such a subject it is obviously impossible to lay down any fixed rules, the more especially as the statute requires such evidence merely to be "to the satisfaction of the justices;" and, as what might satisfy one bench of justices, would probably not satisfy another; but, as has been said, if the woman swears positively to the fact of the defendant being the father of the child, and gives her evidence circumstantially, that evidence may be said to be corroborative in a material particular, which shows that the defendant has been seen with her under very suspicious circumstances, indicating a close and indecent intimacy between them. So, too, evidence of conversations between the woman and the defendant, in which he has been treated as the father, which he has not denied, although he has not admitted it, or indeed any admission by him that he has had any connection with the woman, unless indeed her habits in life are notoriously lewd, in which case such evidence would be of little weight; in fact, the corroborative evidence should be of that nature, as, when coupled with the previous evidence of the woman, to lead the minds of the justices to the reasonable conclusion that the defendant is the father of the child.

With the very great discretion allowed to justices upon the subject, it is not surprising that very few cases upon it have been brought under the attention of the Superior Courts. There are, however, two upon which a judicial decision of the learned judges has been pronounced. The first is that of Reg. v. Pearcy (17 Q. B. 902; 16 Jur. 193, Q. B.; 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 238). In that case the corroborative evidence consisted in the statement of the woman's sister, who swore to a conversation between the defendant and herself, when he, in answer to an observation of the mother that he was the father of the child, and must keep it, said "he should not, and he would rather go to America." Upon a case reserved for the court above as to whether or not this evidence of the woman's sister was corroborative, Lord Campbell, C.J., said, "The 3rd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101" (the statute then in force, and the language of which is similar to that of the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, s. 4) "requires that the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to the satisfaction of the justices. Looking at the evidence set out, we may well suppose that it did corroborate the evidence of the mother to their satisfaction." In the same case Patteson, J., said, "The evidence of the mother is to be corroborated in some material particular to the satisfaction of the justices, not to our satisfaction."

It must not be taken that this decision holds that in any case in which the defendant is charged with being the father of the child, and he must support it, and he declares that he will not do so, his observation is to be taken as a tacit admission of the truth of the charge, the decision merely holds, first, that the evidence may have satisfied the justices; and, secondly, that the corroboration is to be to the satisfaction of the justices, who are the sole judges of its force and effect.

The second case is the very recent one of Cole v. Manning (35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 941). That was a case stated by a Metropolitan police magistrate upon a refusal by him to make an order of affiliation upon the ground of the insufficiency of the corroborative evidence. The woman, it appears, was delivered of the child in October 1875. The corroborative evidence was as follows: That during the summer of 1874 (several months before the child could have been begotten), the parents of the woman, with whom previously the man had been on terms of great intimacy and friendship, refused him the house, and quarrelled with him, owing to their suspicions with regard to his conduct towards their daughter; that they surprised them together on more than one occasion, that the door of the parlour where they were, was closed for a minute or two against them; that the girl sat on the knee of the man; and the magistrate stated that there were other circumstances which would have had great effect on his judgment had they occurred at or about the time the child might have been begotten; he stated also that the girl was rather of weak intellect, but that there was no evidence of any similar misconduct on her part with other men than the defendant. The magistrate was of opinion that the words of the statute would not include evidence of facts long antecedent, and having no direct relation to the actual begetting of the child, however strong might be the moral conviction that such facts might convey to the mind. In giving his judgment, Mellor, J., said that he was of opinion that the magistrate had taken a wrong view of the law, and that he should have received the evidence and judged the weight of it. He further said: "There is no rule of law to exclude such evidence, which might or might not be very material, according to the peculiar circumstances of each case. Here it afforded material corroboration as showing an antecedent probability that the respondent was the father of the appellant's child."

Field, J. also said: "The case must be remitted to the magistrate for his determination after hearing the excluded evidence. The object of the Bastardy Acts is to give a single woman the right of having her child maintained by the father. As the paternity is proved by the evidence of the woman, and as there is great danger in admitting the evidence of one single person against another single person in reference to that which is ordinarily secret, the Legislature has thought fit to require that the evidence of the mother shall be corroborated in some material particular." But no restriction has been imposed with reference to dates. That the evidence would have been material if it had testified to facts happening between the begetting and the birth is not disputed. It is for the magistrate to decide whether evidence testifying to facts happening earlier is material or not."

Although these cases establish no new principle, they are satisfactory as some sort of a guide upon a subject of great practical difficulty. After all, reliance can be placed alone upon the good sense and worldly knowledge and experience of the magistracy. Corroboration is not a matter to be nicely defined, it does not consist in words or writing alone; manner, conduct, intimacy, and a variety of little matters may go far, if not entirely, to supply this species of evidence, and a careful and an astute bench of justices will rarely be at a loss to designate what in any given case does or does not amount to this kind of evidence.

HOARE v. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Property in goods wrongly consigned—New contract between carriers as involuntary bailees and consignors—Damages.

Goulter, solicitor for plaintiff.

Digby, counsel for defendants.

HIS HONOUR delivered judgment this day as follows: In this case I give credit to the testimony of the last witness called by the defendants, Mr. James Farmer, and therefore find that there was only one contract between him and the plaintiff Hoare for the purchase of seven tons of pollard, to be contained in 140 sacks: four tons contained in eighty sacks to be delivered at Swindon, and three tons contained in sixty sacks to be delivered at Pewsey to the order of Mr. James Farmer (which 140 sacks were part of 1000 sacks in the plaintiff's possession), and that the price of the goods was to be £5 10s. per ton for the quantity delivered at Swindon, and £5 11s. per ton for the quantity delivered at Pewsey. Upon this state of facts I think that the property in the sixty sacks did not pass to Mr. James Farmer by the delivery of the eighty sacks to him, and the payment for the same as contended by the defendants' counsel, inasmuch as they were both unascertained parts of the larger quantity in the plaintiff's possession; but I am inclined to think that such property did pass to Mr. James Farmer by the delivery of the sixty sacks to the defendants to carry the same to Pewsey, notwithstanding the mistake in consigning them to Mr. Jeeves's order instead of the plaintiffs: (Blackburn on Sales, p. 128; Jenner v. Smith, L. Rep. 4, C. P. 270; and Re Wiltshire Iron Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 443.) But whether the property or the goods be in Mr. James Farmer or the plaintiff, I think that on Mr. Jeeves refusing to receive the goods a new contract for the safe custody of these goods arose between the plaintiff and the defendants as involuntary bailees: (See the cases of Stevens v. Hart, 4 Bing. 476; Duff v. Budd, 3 B. & B. 177; Hugh v. London and North-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 5 Ex. 51; and McKeon v. McIlvor, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 345.) And that in respect of such new contract the plaintiff is entitled to bring the present action. I further find that upon Mr. Jeeves declining to receive the goods, defendants' servant, the station master at Pewsey, kept them a week or ten days without communicating with the station master at Thatcham, whence the goods were consigned (which he admits to have been his duty), and then delivered them to a Mr. Jarvis on his statement that he expected a similar consignment from a person of the name of Farmer (which is a very common name in the county of Berks), and I think that this was an act of gross negligence for which the defendants, as involuntary bailees, are liable to the plaintiff: (See the case of Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith's Lead. Cas., and the numerous cases collected in the Notes thereto.) With regard to the condition in the consignment note relieving the defendants from "all liability in case of damage or delay, except upon proof that such loss, detention, or injury arose from wilful misconduct," I must observe that it is very inaccurately worded, and varies in a remarkable manner from the notice which precedes it; but it is not necessary for me to examine it critically on the present occasion, as supposing it to be reasonable and to extend to the acts of the defendants, as involuntary bailees (as to which I express no opinion) the wrongful act now complained of appears to me clearly to fall within the terms of "wilful misconduct." In the recent case of Hopson v. The Great Western Railway Company, reported in the LAW TIMES during the month of November last, and in the COUNTY COURTS CHRONICLE, 1st Dec. 1876, vol. 5, N. 8. 491, I fully considered this condition and the terms "wilful misconduct" employed in it, as also the case of Glemster v. The Great Western Railway Company (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 422, Q.B.) cited by counsel in the present case, and the numerous other cases bearing on the subject, and I beg to refer to the observations which I then made in support of the conclusions to which I have now arrived. The defendants' counsel also relied upon the third condition indorsed on the consignment note, viz.: "That no claim for loss or damage will be allowed unless the same be made in writing within three days after the delivery of the goods." Now, supposing this condition to be reasonable, and to extend to the acts of the defendants as involuntary bailees (as to which I express no opinion), it does not appear to me to have any possible application in the present case, inasmuch as the wrongful act of the defendants now complained of was done more than a week after the delivery to Jeeves at Pewsey station, and could not possibly have been complained of within the time limited in the note.

The plaintiff is therefore, in my opinion, entitled to a verdict for the value of the goods which have been wrongfully dealt with by the defendants at the price for which he contracted to sell them, viz., £5 11s. per ton; but I have great doubt whether I ought to calculate the amount upon the quantity which the witness Jarvis deposes was actually contained in the sixty sacks when weighed, viz., a little more than two tons and a half, or on the quantity which the plaintiff contracted to sell to Mr. James Farmer, viz., three tons contained in sixty sacks more or less. Considering, however, that the witness James Farmer paid the defendant for the other four tons contained in eighty sacks in full, that the whole 140 sacks were part of one lot of 1000 sacks, previously purchased by the plaintiff, and that these sixty sacks were left wholly unprotected during their detention at Pewsey, I think that I ought to calculate the amount on the full quantity of three tons, which will be £16 13s. I find also for the value of sixty sacks at 1s. each, £3 to be reduced to 1d. on the delivery to the plaintiff, or his order of the sacks wrongfully dealt with by the defendants. The verdict will, therefore, be for £19 13s., to be reduced to £16 13s. 1d. on delivery of the sacks within a fortnight. As I think the plaintiff's original claim of 6s. a sack for the pollard, and 2s. each for the sacks was erroneous. I shall not give him the costs of the adjournment which was necessary to answer this part of his case; but as the defendants have paid no money into court, and raised so many technical objections, I think it right to give him the previous costs on the higher scale.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Tuesday, Feb. 27.

(Before Mr. Registrar l'EPES.)

Re BEDDEL.

Composition—Surety—Guarantee of payment of instalment—Subsequent bankruptcy of debtor and proof by creditors—Discharge of surety—Election.

THE creditors of the bankrupt had agreed by resolution to accept a composition payable by three instalments, the last instalment to be guaranteed by one Gilbey.

By a deed of inspectorship, Beddel was to be allowed to carry on his business, but if he made default the inspectors might apply for an adjudication in bankruptcy, or compel him to assign his effects to them; and the deed provided "that in the event of the said Beddel being adjudicated bankrupt or of a conveyance or assignment of his property and effects being made or required under the provisions of these presents" before payment, Gilbey should be released from his guarantee.

Beddel was afterwards adjudicated bankrupt on the petition of creditors not bound by the resolution.

The trustee, on behalf of the creditor, recovered from Gilbey in an action at law the amount of the last instalment (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 761 and 927). The Court of Appeal directed that application should be made to the Court of Bankruptcy to ascertain the effect of a certain number of the creditors entitled in the action having proved under the bankruptcy. It appeared that creditors whose debts were represented by about £1070 had so proved, and now Gilbey applied to have the amount of the judgment against him reduced by that amount on the ground that by proving in the bankruptcy they had elected to take the estate and abandon their remedies under the composition.

De Gess, Q.C. and F. O. Crump, supported the motion.

The REGISTRAR decided that the creditors by proving under the bankruptcy had not lost their remedy against the surety, and dismissed the application.

Receivers and their Duties.

IN one of the cases partly heard to-day it transpired that the receiver in an estate in liquidation had prepared a statement of the debtor's affairs to be submitted to a meeting of his creditors.

HIS HONOUR commented strongly on the fact. The receiver, he said, had been intermeddling with matters that were no part of his duty.

Wilkinson (the receiver's solicitor).—Whose duty is it, then?

HIS HONOUR.—The debtor's.

Wilkinson.—If the debtor is unable to do it?

HIS HONOUR.—Let him come to the Court.

Wilkinson.—Then you would have an application every time a petition was filed.

HIS HONOUR.—The applications would be refused unless sufficient reasons were given. The receiver is the last person to help the debtor. He is the officer of the Court, to take possession of the things of the debtor until his affairs come before his creditors. It is out of this that the abuses have arisen, which I hope will soon be corrected.

Wilkinson.—I hope so, and also that the result of these abuses will fall on the heads of the debtors.

HIS HONOUR.—And on those who assist them. The receiver has no right to make out the debtor's accounts for the purposes of his creditors. If the debtor cannot do it himself, let him come to the Court for assistance, and the Court will then consider whether he is entitled to it or not. I am not speaking without some reason, Mr. Wilkinson. Unfortunately, cases come before me—I don't say at Bradford—in which receivers make out accounts, swell the debts, diminish the assets, get an estate to show a small composition, and get a small composition accepted. That comes of the receivers making themselves the agents of the debtors.

Wilkinson.—There is no suggestion that the receiver—

HIS HONOUR.—I am not speaking of this case; but I say that the receivers have no right to assist the debtors in making out their statements.

Wilkinson said he had no doubt that some receivers thought it was their duty to do so.

HIS HONOUR.—I don't know where they have got their impression from.

(Before W. T. S. DANIEL, Q.C.)

Ex parte GLOSSOP; Re HALLIDAY.

Bill of sale—Act of bankruptcy—Fraud.

HIS HONOUR.—This was a motion by the trustee under the liquidation of George Halliday for an order declaring that a bill of sale, dated 27th Nov. 1876, and made between the debtor, of the one part, and Jno. Day, of Idle Colliery, proprietor, of the other part, was fraudulent and void as against creditors, and that the execution of the said bill of sale was an act of bankruptcy, and void as against the trustee, and that Day might pay the costs of and incidental to the motion. The facts are as follow: The debtor was a boat builder, in a small way of business, which he carried on at a yard at Apperly Bridge, near the Leeds and Liverpool canal. He filed his petition of liquidation on the 3rd Nov. 1876. The accounts exhibited at the first meeting of creditors on the 23rd Dec. showed unsecured creditors £1220 11s. 6d., assets £202 12s. 11d. The respondent Day was represented as a secured creditor for £242 7s. 1d. by virtue of the bill of sale in question upon the debtor's stock-in-trade, valued at £400, after deducting cost of realisation. He had no furniture, it had been seized and sold by his landlord under a distress for rent, and realised less than the rent distrained for. His accounts then showed a state of utter insolvency. In Sept. 1876, he had bills becoming due which he could not meet. In Nov. 1876 he was indebted to Margerison for timber to the amount of £281, and he pressed for payment. The debtor proposed to give Margerison a bill of sale on all his effects, but acting under advice Margerison declined to accept it. The debtor, however, represented to Margerison that his difficulties were only temporary, and that if he could complete a boat he was then building, and for which he had materials in the yard, he should be able to tide over all his difficulties.

Upon the faith of this representation Margerison lent him £13 to pay wages, for which the debtor gave Margerison his I O U. The debtor appointed to meet Margerison again on the following Thursday, he did not keep his appointment, but on the 21st Nov. 1876, he went to see Margerison and produced a list of creditors amounting to £253 8s. 8d., but not including Margerison's debt or any debt due to the respondent Day. Upon being asked whether that was all he owed, he said he owed Rhodes and Son under £300, and which was put down in pencil at £300, and being particularly questioned as to any debt he owed to Day, he said he might owe him something, but not above £20. Margerison does not appear to have made any inquiry as to the particulars of the debtor's assets, but, on the faith of the debtor's assurance that his difficulties were only temporary, Margerison, on the 21st Nov. advanced him £15 10s. 11d. to pay a bill that had become overdue a month. On the 24th Nov. the debtor again applied to Margerison to lend him a further sum of £30 to pay a dishonoured bill of Mr. Stead, and he then assured Margerison that if he had but that sum it would relieve him of all his difficulties, and upon the faith of that representation Margerison lent him £30, for which he took his I O U. It now appears that throughout the whole of these transactions the debtor was deceiving and defrauding Margerison, and it seems matter of surprise that Margerison should have allowed himself to have been so deceived and defrauded, but he suffered; he did not try to benefit himself by his credulity. The debtor's transactions with Day have now to be considered. The frauds successfully practised upon Margerison must not, however, be allowed to operate unduly to Day's prejudice; but as Day relies upon the bona fides of his dealings with the debtor, and has sworn to the fact that at the time the bill of sale was given (27th Nov.) he was not aware that the debtor was in insolvent circumstances, but on the contrary, that the debtor represented himself to be solvent, and that he (Day) believed him to be so—it becomes necessary to consider Day's dealings with the debtor very carefully. It appears from the account (exhibit A) produced by Day, that the transactions between him and the debtor commenced on 4th Sept. 1875, and consisted of the loan of small sums of money made from time to time by Day to the debtor. These advances up to 30th Oct. amounted to £58, for which, on the 1st Nov., a bill of that date for four months was given for £101 7s. 6d. This bill was not met by the debtor at maturity, but was retired by Day, and thenceforward until the 12th July, 1876, a series of transactions took place between the debtor and Day, consisting of cash advances and bills, some of the cash advances by Day being for wages, and to enable the debtor to meet a dishonoured bill. The nature of the transactions being such as to show to any man of business and common prudence that the debtor was greatly embarrassed if not insolvent. Ultimately on the 12th July 1876 the debtor gave Day his acceptance for £233 10s. at four months, and which became due on the 15th Nov. On the 12th July it would appear that the cash balance was about £10. On the 15th Nov. assuming that bill to be paid at maturity the cash balance would be in favour of the debtor to the amount of about £5. Day had discounted the bill for £233 10s. with the Halifax Joint-Stock Bank, who were the holders thereof at maturity. It was assumed that the bill was duly presented and dishonoured, and notice of dishonour duly given to Day as drawer and indorser. On the 21st Nov. the banking company commenced an action in the Bradford District Registry of the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice against the debtor and Day, and also the firm of Wm. Day and Son (under which name Day, it appears, carries on business), specially indorsed, to recover £233 10s. due on the bill, with noting expenses and interest. A copy of this writ was on the 21st Nov. duly served on the debtor, and he at once took it to Day, and Day, as he alleges, insisted that the debtor should give him a bill of sale upon his (the debtor's) stock in trade and effects in the yard at Apperly Bridge, and the debtor reluctantly, as Day alleges, yielded to Day's pressure, and agreed to do so, Day agreeing to advance him sufficient to pay the bill, the debtor stating that he should be able to find £185 towards it; and Day then arranged with the debtor to meet together at Day's solicitors the next day and give instructions for the bill of sale. Accordingly, on the 22nd Nov., Day advanced to the debtor the sum of £51 6s. to be applied by him towards the overdue bill, and they afterwards went to the office of Day's solicitor and explained the matter to him, and gave instructions to prepare a bill of sale, which was to be ready in a few days. On the same 22nd Nov. the debtor paid to the solicitor for the banking company the sum of £42 on account of the sum sued for, and promised to bring the remainder in a few days if the bank would give him time. He did not bring the balance, but on the 25th Nov. Day's solicitor entered an appearance to the writ for the debtor, and the same solicitor, on a subsequent day, entered an appearance for William Day, and on a subsequent day another solicitor entered an appearance for Day, the respondent. These appearances were entered obviously merely to gain time, and the attempt at defence being frivolous and vexatious. An order was afterwards obtained by the bank for leave to sign judgment notwithstanding appearance; judgment was afterwards signed against all the defendants, and execution issued, and the residue of the debt and costs was paid to the sheriff by Day, and on the 8th Dec. it was paid to the solicitor for the bank. During this interval the title which Day now relies upon as constituting him the owner of the debtor's stock in trade was acquired. The bill of sale, which the debtor and Day together had instructed Day's solicitor on the 22nd Nov. to prepare, was not executed until the 27th Nov.; probably not prepared until that day, as it is on a lithographed form, the blanks merely being filled in, and it was not registered until the 8th Dec., after the money due on the judgment had been paid by Day. It is made between the debtor, described as a boatbuilder, of the one part, and John Day of the other. It recites that the debtor was indebted to Day in the sum of £245, and Day having required payment thereof, the debtor had requested time for payment thereof, and had agreed to give security for the payment of the same in manner thereafter appearing. It is witnessed that in consideration of the said sum of £245 being then due, and owing by the debtor to Day, and for better securing the payment thereof, the debtor assigned to Day all the canal boat now in course of construction, and the timber, paint, oils, iron, tools, and every the goods, utensils, implements, and things which are now belonging to the debtor, or upon, or about his workshops and yard, situate at Apperly Bridge aforesaid, subject to a proviso for avoiding the same on payment by the debtor to Day of £245, with interest at five per cent. per annum on the 27th Dec. next, or such earlier day as Day should appoint by notice in writing given to the debtor twenty-four hours before the day to be so appointed. In default of payment according to the proviso Day had power to enter, seize, and sell. Notice was given on the 29th Nov., and on the 2nd Dec. Day, by the debtor's foreman as his agent, entered and seized. On the 3rd Dec. the debtor filed his petition for liquidation, and by orders duly made and continued, the sale of the goods so seized has been restrained. The bill of sale upon the face of it is for an existing debt, and the only property of the debtor not comprised in it consisted of his book debts and household furniture. The book debts are not expected to realise £20, and his household furniture has been sold under a distress for rent by the landlord, and have not produced sufficient to pay the rent distrained for. The bill of sale, therefore, comprised substantially all the debtor's available property, and effectually disabled him from carrying on his trade, and, therefore, was an act of bankruptcy, unless it can be shown that advances were made by Day to the debtor under a bona fide belief on his part that the debtor was solvent, and was of such an amount and character as to be reasonably sufficient to enable the debtor to carry on his business. Day has sworn positively that he believed the debtor to be solvent to the very last, and it has been strongly urged on his behalf that I am bound to give credit to his oath. It was urged that Margerison believed the debtor's statement that he was solvent, and upon the faith of that belief advanced the debtor £20, as late as the 24th Nov. If Margerison was deceived, why should not Day be held to be deceived as well? The answer is obvious. As I have said, Margerison proved the sincerity of his belief by lending the debtor money. Margerison endeavoured to obtain from the debtor a statement of his indebtedness, but did not obtain from him any statement of his assets, and has suffered for his misplaced confidence. On the other hand, Day, as shown by the account he has exhibited of his cash and bill transactions, must have known that the debtor was an embarrassed trader, out of whose embarrassment Day, as a money lender, was making a money lender's profit (for none of his transactions with the debtor are legitimate trade transactions, and none of them appear in any way in the books of the debtor). Day does not appear to have inquired or cared to inquire about the debtor's other debts or liabilities. The only inquiry Day cared to make was the value of the debtor's stock-in-trade and effects in his yard, including the boat he was building, and finding that this was estimated at £240, he found it sufficient for his security, and was satisfied. These facts appear to me sufficient to make it my duty to disbelieve Day's statement that when he required the bill of sale to be given, he believed the debtor to be solvent. On the contrary, I am satisfied that he believed the debtor to be insolvent, and took the bill of sale because he so believed. And as to the advances which were made by Day, they were not made under any previous bona fide arrangement, or for the purpose of enabling the debtor to continue his trade. They consisted of two sums of £51 6s. and £14. The former sum was paid to the debtor to enable him to make a payment to the bank on account of the sum sued for, and as a means of gaining time. Of this sum the debtor applied £42 for that purpose, and that was a payment really in the interest of Day, because he was included in the suit, and liable to have judgment signed and enforced against him for the whole debt, as was ultimately done after Day's vexatious attempts at delay had been defeated. As to the £14 that appears from Day's account (exhibit A) to have been paid on the 27th Nov. (the day the bill of sale was executed), to enable the debtor to pay out Stead's execution—the very debt towards which the debtor had on the 24th Nov. (while the bill of sale was in progress) fraudulently obtained from Margerison the sum of £30. Upon the hearing, several authorities were pressed upon me as tending to uphold the bill of sale as valid: (Ex parte Tweeddale, L. Rep. 14 Eq. 586; Ex parte Fisher, L. Rep. 7 Ch. Ap. 636; Ex parte King, L. Rep. 1 C. D. 256; Lomas v. Buxton, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 107; Ex parte Winders, L. Rep. 1 Ch. D. 290; Ex parte Ellis, L. Rep. 2 C. D. 797). None of these cases appear to me to be applicable in favour of Day's contention, if my view of the facts as established by the evidence is correct, but, on the contrary, are decisive authorities against him. In my opinion the bill of sale is void as being a transfer of substantially the whole of the debtor's property for an existing debt, the creditor knowing that the debtor was insolvent, and not having made any subsequent advance of money bona fide for the purpose of enabling the debtor to continue in trade. The order will, therefore, declare the bill of sale void; that the respondent Day do forthwith retire from the possession of the goods comprised in the bill of sale, and give up such possession to the trustee. I make the injunction already granted absolute, and order Day to pay the costs of this motion, and the orders for the injunction and the costs incurred by the trustee in keeping possession. I have not thought it necessary to examine the several cases cited in order to show their inapplicability to the present case. The principles to be applied are clear: the difficulty is properly to ascertain the facts which must regulate their application. This involves an appreciation of the evidence upon which almost of necessity different minds will form different conclusions. Hence the proverbial uncertainty of the law, especially illustrated in the perplexing decisions upon bills of sale by insolvent traders. If I am wrong I have given the respondent the grounds of my decision that he may appeal if so advised.

HIS HONOUR said: The following are the facts of this case: On the 3rd Dec. 1875, certain infants, by their next friend, Henry Danson, filed a bill in the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, against James Rose Willacy, as trustee of a settlement, to make good a sum of £1000. On the 17th Feb. 1876, James Rose Willacy filed a petition for liquidation in this court, and on the same day notice of that petition was given to Mr. Danson. Mr. Banner was duly appointed trustee under the liquidation, and on the 27th April an order of revival of the above-mentioned suit against him as such trustee was made by the Court of Chancery. On the 19th Aug. a decree in the suit was made, the material part of which is as follows: "This court doth declare that the defendant, James Rose Willacy, was at the date of the liquidation of his affairs and he now is personally liable to make good the sum of £1000, and that the above-named Henry Danson be at liberty to prove, on behalf of the persons interested, as represented, for the said sum of £1000, and the plaintiff's said costs as a debt against the estate of the said James Rose Willacy." Proofs for the £1000 and for the costs were tendered to the trustee accordingly, who admitted the proof for £1000, but rejected that for costs amounting to £106, on the ground that the latter was not a debt provable in liquidation. From this decision of the trustee Mr. Danson appealed to this court. It was argued that the above-mentioned decree amounted to an order of the Court of Chancery, and those proofs should be admitted, but I do not so regard it. In my opinion it was only intended as giving leave to Mr. Danson to prove, in his capacity as next friend to the infant plaintiffs, and that it left the question as to the admissibility of the proofs to this court. As to all costs incurred subsequent to Mr. Danson's notice of the petition for liquidation, I am bound by the words of the 31st section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, which are as follows: "No person having notice of any act of bankruptcy available for adjudication against the bankrupt shall prove for any debt or liability contracted by the bankrupt subsequent to the date of his so having notice." It is hardly necessary to say that this section is applicable to liquidation, and the costs incurred after the 17th Feb. are, in my opinion, a liability within the meaning of the 31st section, contracted by the bankrupt subsequent to the date of the creditor having notice of the act of bankruptcy, and they are not merely a liability imposed by an order of the Court of Chancery, with which the creditor had nothing to do, for he might have discontinued the suit, and proved for the debt under the liquidation; but he elected to go on with the suit. It remains to consider whether the costs prior to the notice are provable. In my opinion they come within the meaning of the words of the second branch of the 31st section, as being a "liability to which the debtor has become subject during the continuance of the liquidation by reason of an obligation incurred prior to the liquidation." On the 19th Aug. the Court of Chancery finds by its decree that the debtor was liable to pay the £1000 at the date of the liquidation. The obligation, therefore, which this decree enforces existed at the time of the liquidation; but if the payment of the £1000 was an obligation at that time, the costs necessarily incurred in establishing that obligation are, in my opinion, a liability incurred by reason of that obligation, and it was as the debtor became subject to by the decree of the court, which was made during the continuance of the liquidation. I am of opinion, therefore, that the creditor is entitled to prove for the amount of the costs incurred up to the date when he received notice of the liquidation petition, which I believe will be found to be the 17th Feb. Mulholland, instructed by Yates and Co., appeared for the trustee.

STRANGE SCENE IN A NATAL LAW COURT.

A STRANGE scene occurred in the Supreme Court of Natal shortly before the departure of the last steamer from that colony. Dr. Smith, a barrister, late of the Norfolk Circuit, England, who, since his arrival in Natal, has acted as editor of a newspaper called the Witness, published at Mankburg, brought an action against the Times of Natal, the opposition newspaper, for libel. He claimed £500 damages, on the ground that the Times had accused him of scurrility. The learned doctor attended at the Supreme Court, which was presided over by Connor, C.J., for the purpose of arguing his exceptions to the defendant's plea, and was attired in the wig and gown of an English barrister. He was proceeding to argue his exceptions to the defendant's plea, when the Chief Justice, in interrupting him, said: "You are not in costume." Dr. Smith looked puzzled, and the Chief Justice repeated the expression.

Dr. Smith.—I am not aware that there is anything wrong in my attire.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Yes there is. You are dressed as an English barrister and not as an advocate of this court.

Dr. Smith said he was very sorry if his robes were any way irregular, and he would be happy on another occasion to make any alteration which his Lordship would desire.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—You must do it now. I cannot hear you unless you do it.

Dr. Smith (in astonishment).—Do I understand your Lordship to direct me to alter my attire in open court?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Yes, if you wish to be heard.

Dr. Smith.—Would your Lordship kindly indicate to me the nature of the change which I am to make at so short a notice?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—You wear a wig. You must take it off.

Dr. Smith.—A wig is an antiquated article of attire till lately worn, in some shape, by gentlemen. Any man is entitled to wear artificial hair here or in the street, and doing so is at most an eccentricity.

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Not so. It is a covering to the head, like a hat or any other, and you must not appear here covered.

Dr. Smith.—Now that your Lordship has expressed that view, which is quite new to me, I presume your Lordship will not put me to the trouble of making the alteration now, but will allow me to correct the mistake another time? It would be more usual and more agreeable.

The CHIEF JUSTICE (with energy).—No, now. If not, we must adjourn the case. When shall we adjourn it to?

Dr. Smith.—As far as I understand your Lordship, if I take my wig off I may go on?

The CHIEF JUSTICE.—Yes.

Dr. Smith (putting his wig on the table).—Then there it is, my Lord; and I have six objections to the defendant's plea.

The whole of the doctor's objections, except one, were overruled.

ONE of the most genial, popular, and successful members of the Bar has been suddenly cut off in the prime of life, and when his career was promising a bright future—Charles Lanyon. He was actually engaged in a pending cause when the fever which killed him seized him. He was an energetic supporter of the Barristers' Benevolent Association, and was a universal favourite in the Profession.

SALE OF SERJEANTS' INN.—On Friday, the 23rd ult., the sale took place at Tokenhouse-yard, the auction being conducted by Mr. George Trist, of the firm of Messrs. Norton, Trist, Watney, and Co. The property consisted of "a substantial pile of buildings, known as 1, 2, and 3, Serjeant's-inn, producing at present upwards of £1200 per annum, and also Serjeant's-inn Hall, Chancery-lane, the whole occupying an area of nearly 17,000 superficial feet." Serjeant's-inn Hall was described as comprising "a lofty dining hall with five richly-stained glass windows, a coffee room, a lofty chapel with three richly-stained glass windows, judges' robing room, serjeants' robing room," &c., and it was hinted that its locality being "in close proximity to the new law courts, it offered unusual facilities for the erection of an institution or club house." The auctioneer, after reading the printed particulars, said he estimated the freehold to be worth £3 per foot, which would amount to £51,000. Then the property upon it was worth £20,000—say £70,000 together, from which, if the commuted value of the charges upon it was deducted, which he estimated at £6330, there remained £63,670 as the value of the property offered. £40,000 was the first bid, followed by offers of £45,000 and £50,000. Having got to this point Mr. Trist announced that the property was now for free competition, without reserve. From this figure the bidding rose by strides of £500 up to £52,000, and subsequently progressed in offers varying from £100 to £500 to £57,100, at which price it was knocked down to Mr. Serjeant Cox. The biddings from £52,000 upwards had, in fact, been confined solely to Mr. Serjeant Cox's agent and to a gentleman who represented the Law Fire Office in Chancery-lane.

QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERS OF TOWN COUNCILS, &c.—A Bill "to amend the law relating to the qualification for members of town councils and local boards" has been ordered to be printed by the House of Commons. It has been prepared and brought in by Mr. Bart, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Morley, and Mr. Mundella. The following is a copy of the bill: "Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the qualification for members of town councils and local boards: Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—1. Subject as hereafter in this Act mentioned, every person shall be qualified for election to the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor of a municipal borough, or of any ward thereof, who at the time of such election is duly enrolled as a burgess or citizen of such borough in the burgess roll or ward lists in force at the time of such election, and who has resided in such borough during twelve months immediately preceding the day of such election. 2. Subject as hereafter in this Act mentioned, every person shall be qualified for election as a member of a local board for any local government district who at the time of such election is entitled to vote at such election, and who has resided within such district during twelve months preceding the day of such election.—3. The foregoing enactments shall be subject to the following provisions, that is to say—(a.) The qualifications mentioned in the said enactments shall be alternatives for and shall not repeal or take away any other qualification.—(b.) Nothing in this Act shall qualify any person for any office who is disqualified for such office by the existing law by reason of office, contract, bankruptcy, or any other matter of disqualification or disability.—(c.) If a person qualified under this Act ceases for six months to reside within the borough or district, in which he has been elected to an office, he shall cease to be qualified under this Act, and his office shall become vacant, unless he was at the time of his election, and continues to be, qualified in some other manner. 4. This Act shall, as regards boroughs, be construed as one with the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, entitled "An Act to provide for the regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales," as amended by any Acts for the time being in force, and shall as regards local boards be construed as one with the Public Health Act 1875, as amended by any Acts for the time being in force. 5. This Act may be cited for all purposes as the Town Councils and Local Boards Act 1877." It has been read a second time.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE PROFESSION.

NOTE.—This Department of the LAW TIMES being open to free discussion on all professional topics, the Editors do not hold themselves responsible for any opinions or statements contained in it.

THE COMPANIES ACT 1867, s. 38.—As a solicitor having had more than the average experience of solicitors in company matters, I venture to draw the attention of the Profession to the false position in which solicitors now find themselves, in consequence of the recent decision of the Court of Common Pleas with respect to the contracts which the 38th section of the Companies Act 1867, require to be notified in prospectuses. For my own part I have had, times without number, to advise boards of directors and others, when a company was about to be brought out, as to what contracts should be inserted in the prospectus, and I have, under the advice of able counsel, acted upon the principle that the only contracts required to be set out were contracts made with or on behalf of the company, or in respect of which the company could either sue or be sued. This interpretation of the section has, I venture to say, been universally accepted and acted upon by the Profession; and of the many hundreds of companies which have been formed since 1867, there are probably not 5 per cent. in respect of which there have not been contracts entered into of a character similar to those made in the Lisbon Tramways case, and of which no mention whatever has been made in the prospectus. If, therefore, the judgment in Twyecross v. Grant is good law, it is fearful to contemplate the result as regards all those companies to which I have alluded, and as regards the persons who happen to have been their promoters, directors, or officers. Each and all of these persons may be made responsible to return to the shareholders the full amount of the share capital of the respective companies in which they have been concerned, which means that because their solicitor or counsel are found to have taken a view of the law different from that which the court has only now arrived at, they are to be ruined for an error inadvertently made in omitting to name in a prospectus a contract, no matter how trivial, and which may not have damaged the shareholders one iota. But to come to solicitors personally; is it not at least open to question whether they cannot be made personally responsible to the clients whom they may have so wrongly advised? I fear there is considerable danger, at any rate, that this view may be taken of the matter by clients smarting under the injustice of being ruined for a mere lawyer's error. I am glad to see, by an article in your paper of Saturday last, that some attempt is being made, by the introduction of a Bill in Parliament this session to remedy matters for the future, but no legislation will be of any use unless it have a retrospective operation, and provide an indemnity in all cases where contracts have been omitted to be mentioned in prospectuses bona fide and with no fraudulent intent. I commend this view to the attention of all solicitors who have had anything to do with the issue of companies' prospectuses, and I would strongly suggest that they should urge upon Members of Parliament with whom they have influence, the importance of having a measure so framed as to provide a really effectual protection against all involuntary errors in the construction and application of the 38th section of the Act of 1867. Indeed I believe it will be found that a very large number of the members of the House of Commons have actually rendered themselves liable to the consequences I have pointed out, if the construction now put upon the section by the Court of Common Pleas is to hold good. There ought, therefore, to be no difficulty in passing such a provision as I have suggested, were it only for their own individual protection.

A SOLICITOR OF MORE THAN TWENTY YEARS' STANDING.

APPEARANCE—NOTICE OF—ORDER XII., RULE 6 AND RULE 5 OF THE RULES OF FEB. 1876.—On reading the last issue of the LAW TIMES I notice the following remarks on the above subject. "Under Order XII., rule 6, when appearance was entered in London to a writ issued from a district registry, the defendant was required to give notice of appearance at the address for service in London. Now he can either do that or give notice at the address for service in the district of the district registry." On referring to rule 5 of the Feb. rules, I find that such rule requires a defendant who appears elsewhere than where the writ is issued, on the day he appears to give notice of appearance, either by notice served in the ordinary way at the address for service within the district of the district registry, or by prepaid letter directed to such address (i. e., within the district of the district registry), and posted on that day in due course of post. Rule 6 having been annulled by rule 5 of the Feb. rules, it is no longer optional with the defendant to give notice of appearance either at the London address for service or the district registry address for service; but he is bound to give notice at the latter address, and he need not give it at the former address. J. CLIFF.

COMMISSIONS FOR OATHS.—In the work by Mr. Charles Ford, entitled "Oaths in the Supreme Court," it is said that the wording of the provision under which applicants for commissionships must have taken out six annual certificates, "justifies the opinion that it will be sufficiently complied with if an applicant has six times consecutively obtained an annual certificate, although he may not have been in practice six years." I quite agree with the author quoted, but it will probably interest intending applicants to learn that the official construction of the rule is that six complete years must have elapsed from the date of admission before appointment. It should, of course, be borne in mind that the Lord Chancellor has given the Law Society "to understand that in circumstances of a very special nature a commission would be granted a solicitor, although such regulations may not have been entirely complied with" (Ford, p. 7). A curious point has come under my notice in reference to these commissions. The Lord Chancellor's officers hold that the commissioner may administer the oath directly the commission is signed, while the officials at the Law Institution, relying no doubt on the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, say that it is necessary for the commission to be registered with the Law Society before it is acted on. The matter may be of importance, as I know of at least one commissioner appointed under the Judicature Act who has acted prior to registration, and the question arises whether the deponents in such cases are really sworn in a legal sense. It may be added that Mr. Ford's work lays down the rule against the Law Society's view, while Mr. Braithwaite's Manual (p. 7) supports it.

EIGHTEENPENCE.

INTERCHANGE BETWEEN THE TWO BRANCHES.—I think it would be only fair if the clause in the Legal Practitioners' Bill referred to in your issue of the week before last contained a provision for reducing the duty on admitting to the Inns of Court ex-articled clerks as well as ex-solicitors. The student who has paid for an £80 stamp upon his articles, and in the course or after the termination of his service proceeds to the higher branch of the Profession, should certainly not forfeit all title to consideration because he has not also paid the additional £30 or so required for admission on the roll of solicitors.

ONE WHO DID THIS.

READING FOR HONOURS.—Your remarks in last week's issue on the prizes given by the Incorporated Law Society, and the letter of "A Clifford's Inn Prizeman," touch on subjects which would be most beneficially discussed by lawyers and law students. Your observations as to the selfishness of the system of awarding scholarships by the Inns of Court, considering that the wealth of those bodies was to a large extent founded by the junior branch of the Profession, are well put, and it is hoped that the benchers may at length be brought to see the justice and desirability of dispensing their rewards more generally among law students. It is also much to be desired that the members of the junior branch will move in the matter of establishing substantial inducements and rewards for learning. But even until such a state of things comes about, is it not in the power of the Law Society to make an improvement, even without pecuniary assistance? Would not the quasi-anomaly (which "A Clifford's Inn Prizeman" seems to think is quite an anomaly) of "reading for honours" be to a certain extent removed if the examiners would give distinctions in the pass lists, putting, say, the first thirty successful candidates in order of merit? I do not know whether the examiners object thus to classify on the ground that solicitors might be influenced in practice in the eyes of the public by their relative order of merit in the examinations. If there is any such objection, surely there is no ground for it, for the learning required to pass the final examination is fixed as the standard to which it is necessary that students should attain to be thoroughly qualified practitioners; and although honours would signify that those obtaining them had exceeded that standard, or at all events had thoroughly attained to it, yet the very fact of those other candidates obtaining a pass would be of itself a proof that they were, in the opinion of the authorities, as fully qualified to practise as those who had excelled them in the technical examination. The benefits arising from such a system would, I think, be great. It would stimulate a greater desire for depth of learning among students, and those who had the inclination and opportunity of studying for "honours" would then have the satisfaction of knowing that there were some honours (though barren) to crown their efforts. It is hoped that we shall be favoured with more of your valuable remarks and suggestions on the subject, and also a discussion in your columns, which we know are always open for the reception of that which will in any way benefit the Profession therein represented.

Queries.

117. HIRE OF FURNITURE—CUSTOM—BANKRUPTCY—ORDER AND DISPOSITION.—Allow me to call the attention of your correspondent "T. J. C. Borden" to the report of Ex parte Powell; Re Matthews (34 L. T. Rep., 224) where it was held—differing from the decision of the Chief Judge in Hankruptcy—that the existence of such a custom had not been so frequently proved that the Court could take judicial notice of it, and that it was not sufficiently proved, in that case. "Now the reported cases," says Mellish L.J., delivering the written judgment of the Court, "are few in number, and seem to us insufficient to establish that the alleged custom has been frequently proved." OUTIS.

118. COMMUNITY OF EMPLOYMENT.—In reference to your leader, in last week's issue, on "Community of Employment," I venture to suggest, as a general definition, "All subdivisions of labour, culminating in the accomplishment of one common end." Turner v. Great Eastern Company (33 L. T. Rep. 431) is rather hostile, but that case was characterised by Coleridge, C.J., as "a difficult one and near the line." The meanings of "Community of Employment" mentioned in the same article often occur in the one and the same case. Take for instance the example of employer—contractor—servant. Here the identity of employer must first be determined, i.e., the answer to the question fellow-servant or not, before the identity of work, i.e., common employment, in the usual acceptation of the phrase, can be inquired into. I should be exceedingly obliged if one of your correspondents would tell me whether the above is an accurate summary of the law on this point? OUTIS.

119. MASTER—SERVANT—NEGLECT OF FELLOW-SERVANT.—Is the following a correct summary of the law? The master is not liable when both are engaged upon a common employment, for the law presumes that the risk was contemplated by the servant at the time when he entered his master's employment. This presumption, however, can be rebutted, (a) By showing that the risk was not so contemplated, i.e., was not reasonably incidental; (b) By proving negligence on the master's part. This negligence, the onus of proving which lies on the servant, must be one of the following specific acts: (1) That the master undertook personally to superintend the work; (2) That the persons employed by the master were not proper and competent persons; (3) That the materials were defective (see Murphy v. Philbrick, 33 L. T. Rep. 477); (4) That the materials were inadequate, or the means and resources unsuitable to accomplish the work (see Allen v. New Gas Company, 34 L. T. Rep. 543). The master, on the other hand, is liable where the employment is not common, unless he can show that the risk was reasonably incidental, and, therefore, within the contemplation of the servant at the time of his engagement, or unless he can prove contributory negligence on the part of the servant. OUTIS.

120. BASTARDY.—Can a woman who, since the birth of the child, has married, and is living with her husband, apply for an order of affiliation upon the putative father? DEVON.

121. SCHOOL BOARD CONVEYANCES.—Do school board conveyances for valuable considerations require enrolment under the act 9 Geo. 2, intitled "An act to restrain the dispositions of lands, whereby the same become unalienable." 31 & 32 Vict. c. 44, sect. 1, states no enactment is necessary where the grant is really and bona fide made for full and valuable consideration. E. G.

122. SERVICE OF WRIT—AGENT'S CHARGES.—I charged a London correspondent 6s. 6d. for affidavit of service of writ and oath. He writes me word the 1s. 6d. is always included in the 6s. charge for affidavit. Is this correct? A COUNTRY SOLICITOR.

[Under the old practice you were entitled to 6s. The allowance is now 6s. 6d., as you say.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

123. ONE SOLICITOR ACTING AS ADVOCATE FOR ANOTHER.—Will you or any of your readers kindly inform me by what rule one solicitor is prohibited from acting as advocate for another?

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

[By the County Court Act 1852. The provision ought to be repealed.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

124. WIDENING COUNTY BRIDGE—EXPENSE OF.—A county bridge repaired at the expense of the county is situate near the boundary of the district of an urban sanitary authority. The justices of the peace for the county are willing to widen the bridge providing the authority will contribute one half of the expense of so doing. Can the authority legally apply their funds or charge the rates for this purpose (43 Geo 3 c. 59, s. 2)? A.

125. ARTICLED CLERK—ASSIGNMENT.—Can a solicitor who has two article clerks take an additional one upon one of the two being assigned to his agent? H. [Yes, if there is a deed of assignment, not otherwise. See sect. 4 of 6 and 7 Vic. cap. 73.—ED. SOLS. DEPT.]

126. SOLICITOR COVENANT NOT TO PRACTICE.—A is under a covenant not to practice as a solicitor in the parish of X. Persons residing at X. are desirous of employing A. as their solicitor. Does the above covenant debar A. from acting for such clients, and can A. make appointments to meet them at an inn in X., without infringing his covenant? Are there any cases bearing upon the question? A.

127. PENNETT CHASE ACT.—Would you kindly inform me when the Pennett Chase Enclosure Act was passed? ENQUIRER.

128. WEEKLY TENANCY.—Lodgings are taken on a Wednesday, and the rent is paid weekly. On a subsequent Thursday morning the tenant says he is leaving that day, and tenders rent to the Wednesday following. Can the landlord demand a fortnight's rent in lieu of notice, seeing that the notice is not given on a Wednesday; or would the tenant's notice be held reasonable and sufficient? EGER.

Answers.

(Q 97.) VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874.—I beg to differ from the answers hereto contained in last week's LAW TIMES. The 4th sect. of above Act states "that the legal personal representative of a mortgagee of a freehold estate . . . may, on payment of all sums secured by the mortgage, convey the mortgaged estate"—not reconvey—so that it is implied by the sect. itself that the estate may be conveyed to some person other than the mortgagee. I am confirmed in this opinion on referring to "Prideaux's Conveyancing," eighth edition, vol. I., p. 494, where I find it stated that the Act applies, "not only to a reconveyance to the mortgagor himself, but to any case where the mortgagee, for the time being, receives the whole of the money; as, for example, a transfer of the whole debt in consideration of the full amount paid by the transferee to the transferee. And your correspondent will find at p. 670 of the same vol. a form of transfer by the administrator of a deceased mortgagee." J. G. M.

(Q 101.) CONVEYANCING.—The case your correspondent "G. S. B." refers to is Vale of Neath Colliery Company v. Furness (34 L. T. Rep., 231). OUTIS.

C. E. PALMER, ESQ.

THE late Charles Edmund Palmer, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, of Plowden-buildings, Temple, died on the 3rd inst., after an illness of two years' duration, at the residence of his brother, the Rev. George Thomas Palmer, St. Mary's Rectory, Newington, in the fortieth year of his age, was the third son of the late John Palmer, Esq., of Westbourne, Sussex, a magistrate for that county, and formerly of the 2nd Ceylon Regiment, who served through the Ceylon War as Aide-de-camp to Lieutenant-General Sir John Hamilton, and who died in 1839. He has boldly disputed the right of any member to call upon him to answer to the House for his conduct as a Judge. The Times calls this "audacious." So it is. But our contemporary admits that it is successful, unless Parliament resorts to the strong measure of attempting to remove him from the Bench, which it admits would be absurd in the present instance. Our idea is, however, that no public man can escape the consequence of indiscretion by refusing to answer for it to the House of Commons.

WHEN we find that Vice-Chancellor MALINS is constantly over-ruled by the Court of Appeal on matters of simple discretion and the exercise of common sense (see Morgan v. Elford, alluded to in another paragraph, and the case of Mr. Clements, reported in the Times of Thursday), it is alarming to hear that he has refused a defendant's application to have issues of fraud tried by a jury. The court, said the VICE-CHANCELLOR, had always had jurisdiction in questions of fraud, and he insisted on trying it himself. Unfortunately, it is not unusual to find obstinacy accompanying an utter want of sound judgment.

We trust we shall not be supposed to be actuated by any but the highest motives in occasionally criticising the "authorised reports." In the interests of the Profession—in the pecuniary interests of subscribers—it is essential that something superior to the present sleepy editorial supervision should be brought to bear upon them. In the current part of the Chancery Division reports we find a case of Morgan v. Elford. The report extends from p. 352 to p. 388—thirty-six pages! Nineteen of those pages are devoted to a judgment of Vice-Chancellor MALINS setting out elaborately the evidence upon which he came to the conclusion that the defendant had been guilty of fraud. On this very evidence the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the defendant had done nothing inconsistent with the nicest sense of honour or with the most scrupulous integrity! The legal principle upon which the Vice-Chancellor founded his judgment was not noticed by the Court of Appeal, and this report, therefore, is a report of conflicting views on questions of fact, and is a gross imposition upon subscribers—as gross as the famous Consolidated Digest.

DOUBTLESS Judges often feel it a matter of some difficulty to determine whether certain conduct justifies a committal for contempt of court. In Clarke v. Roche, a case determined in the Court of Appeal on the 7th inst., at least so far as concerns any question of committing for contempt, the Master of the Rolls laid down a rule which may perhaps be of some utility in the future. He is reported to have said that the jurisdiction, in cases of contempt ought to be exercised only when there is no other remedy and when the mischief would be irremediable. Strictly speaking, this is not an embodiment of the law, but it expresses with sufficient exactness a rule which might be followed with advantage. In this particular case the court refused to exercise its powers of calling upon a person to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court. An action commenced in the Cheltenham County Court was decided in favour of the plaintiff. Some of the defendants obtained a rule calling upon the Judge to show cause why he should not sign a special case. The rule was discharged, and an appeal was made to the Court of Appeal. One of the defendants wrote to a country newspaper commenting on the facts of the case, and the letter was published. An application was then made on behalf of the plaintiff for a rule calling on the writer of that letter and the printer of the newspaper to attend to answer for their contempt in relation to the writing and publishing of the letter, on the ground that the letter was calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the action upon the appeal. This application was supported by an affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor, denying the truth of the statement in the letter complained of. The court refused to make an order. There can be little doubt that if our courts showed themselves zealous to detect cases of contempt their work would soon be materially increased.

RECENT cases in the Supreme Court contain a larger proportion than usual of decisions in which questions connected with the law relating to contempt of court are involved. In The Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger Vice-Chancellor MALINS had made an order requiring the solicitor of one of the defendants in the action to pay the costs of a motion to commit him for an alleged contempt of court. The facts upon which the order was obtained may be soon stated. An order having been made in the action for inspection by the plaintiffs of certain documents in the possession of the defendants, for whom the solicitor in question acted, the latter, however, objected to allow the inspection, lost his temper upon a subsequent visit from the plaintiff's solicitor, and used language for which he afterwards apologised. The VICE-CHANCELLOR subsequently made the order complained of, at the same time expressing his opinion that the solicitor had been guilty of a contempt of court. Upon appeal the order of the VICE-CHANCELLOR was discharged. The MASTER OF THE ROLLS is reported to have been quite at a loss to understand how the solicitor's conduct could be treated as a contempt of court. "It appears to me," said the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, "that the jurisdiction of the court in relation to contempt being arbitrary and unlimited, ought to be most jealously and carefully restricted. It should not be exercised by a Judge without the greatest care in seeing that there are no other means not thus arbitrary of remedying the evil." The Judge, his Lordship thought, ought to be most careful to ascertain that the proceedings in the cause could not be prosecuted unless this jurisdiction was exercised. It was a necessary jurisdiction, but it was so only in the sense in which other extreme measures are sometimes necessary to preserve a man's rights, that is, when no other pertinent remedy can be found. Lord Justice MELLISH disposed of any argument in support of the VICE-CHANCELLOR'S view by a reductio ad absurdum argument. If the VICE-CHANCELLOR'S decision was right, it would follow that whenever the solicitors engaged in an action, or their clerks, had to meet each other, and one of them happened to lose his temper, and make use of improper language, that could be treated as a contempt of court. Such a conclusion is obviously absurd.

THE decision of Mr. Justice DENMAN, in the case of Johnson v. The Credit Lyonnais, seems to us an instance of carrying technicality too far. It is founded upon, and follows, a well known case, Cole v. The North Western Bank. The principle is that if a person is in possession of goods, as an agent, he is not able to give a purchaser a better title than he himself has—that is, if he is a mere agent to take care of goods, a sale by him is invalid; whilst, if he is an agent for sale, he may sell. To this, at first sight, every one would agree. But suppose the goods are, as they were in the case before us, in a warehouse, and the agent holds the indicia, or documents of title, the case is very different. Again, whether the agent is a mere warehouseman, or other person whose description shows that he has no right to deal with them, or whether he is a commission agent whose description implies a power to do so, is a very material circumstance. In Johnson v. The Credit Lyonnais, not only was the agent a merchant, but he was the paid vendor of goods, which remained in his name in a dock company's warehouse, and for which he also held the warrants, to suit the convenience of the plaintiff, the purchaser. Having complete power over the goods, the agent pledged them to the defendants, and handed over to them the warrants, when they procured a transfer of the goods in the Dock Company's books into, and an issue of new warrants in, their own names. In an action between the careless and the innocent parties, the former was held to have the better title, principally upon the ground that the common custom of the trade was to place infinite reliance in agents of this sort. Lawyers may be technical, and merchants are fond of finding fault with them for being so; but if the lawyers are to blame sometimes, what shall we say of the conduct of business men as disclosed at the trial of this case? The plaintiff, in order to save himself the trouble of sending the warrants to the agent whenever he wanted to deal with the goods, left the entire control of his property in the hands of that person, who took advantage of his power to make away with it to somebody else. So far, the matter only concerned himself; but then the plaintiff applied to the law to take the property away from an innocent person, and restore it to him. He was to blame, and not the pledgees, who had no knowledge of the vice of title, and yet he sought to obtain, and the law gave him, restitution of his property. The fact that the agent was a paid vendor, seems to us no justification of the decision. If it goes for anything at all it is only a point more in favour of the innocent pledgees, for it prevented the Dock Company from being in a position to inform the pledgees of their want of title, that company only knowing the goods as those of the agent. We doubt that the judgment is good law, and maintain that it is not the lawyers who are to blame in this case. If we are mistaken, it is time for a new Factors' Act, and for a reconsideration of some of the leading cases in equity.

THE County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) empowered Her MAJESTY in council, on the representation of the LORD CHANCELLOR, to confer an Admiralty jurisdiction upon such County Courts as were thought to be fit and proper to exercise that jurisdiction. The 3rd section of the same Act defined the limits of the jurisdiction which might be so conferred, namely: (1) As to any claim for salvage. Any cause in which the value of the property saved does not exceed £1000, or in which the amount claimed does not exceed £300. (2) As to any claim for towage, necessities, or wages. Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed £150. (3) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision. Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed £300. (4) Any cause in respect of any such claim or claims as aforesaid, but in which the value of the property saved or the amount claimed is beyond the amount limited as above mentioned, when the parties agree by a memorandum signed by them or by their agents that any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction and specified in the memorandum shall have jurisdiction. The extent of the jurisdiction conferred by this section in cases of disputes arising out of the distribution of salvage was discussed in the recent case of The Glannibanta 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 27, an appeal from the judgment of the County Court held at Sunderland. From the facts in the case it appeared that The Glannibanta struck the bar of Sunderland harbour, and whilst in great danger was rescued by a pilot and others, who went out in a steam tug to her assistance. The owners of the steam tug which put off to the assistance of The Glannibanta received £250, and they paid the pilot and certain others the sum of £7 13s. 4d. each as their share of the salvage. The latter, however, brought an action against the owners of the steam tug for a more equitable distribution of the sum of £250 paid for services to The Glannibanta. At the trial it was objected that County Courts have no jurisdiction over claims for distribution of salvage; and that, assuming there was such jurisdiction, the plaintiffs could not proceed with the action unless they first brought the several sums of £7 13s. 4d. received by them into court. The County Court Judge dismissed the action with costs, on the ground of want of jurisdiction. Sir R. PHILLIMORE, however, has decided that the County Court Judge was wrong, and that he should have entertained the action upon its merits.

THE injunction granted by Sir R. MALINS in Bowden v. Russell, on the 3rd inst., as well as the comments made by his Lordship, ought to impress upon litigants some useful lessons. In this case the plaintiffs, who were shipowners, prayed that a certain agreement of partnership might be declared valid, and that the defendants might be compelled to account or give damages. At the present stage the defendant moved for an order to commit the plaintiffs for contempt of court in publishing or circulating copies of their statement of claim in the action, and for an injunction to restrain them from doing so in future. According to the defendant, who was a shipbroker at Liverpool, the statement of claim contained allegations which were injurious to his character; these allegations he would be able to disprove at the trial, yet the plaintiffs had sent them to several of his employers. The plaintiffs, however, maintained that their allegations were true; that the defendant's conduct was such that the plaintiffs were compelled, in order to counteract his misstatements to their prejudice, to send their own employers copies of the statement of claim. At the hearing, however, the order for committal was waived. His lordship pointed out that the plaintiffs might either have sent the statement of claim itself or copies of it in the form of a letter. If they had adopted the latter course it would depend on circumstances whether they would or would not be guilty of libel. The real question was therefore whether they had not done what was very much the same thing. Relying upon Re The Cheltenham, &c., Wagon Company (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 580) he came to the conclusion that the cases were in effect the same, and quoted from his judgment in that case the following observations: "The petition itself contains grave and serious charges with reference to the conduct of the directors; but the broad question is whether it is allowable for the publisher of a newspaper to print proceedings pending in the court before such proceedings have come on to be heard. The principle is equally applicable to any bill or answer or petition which may be filed in this court, the statements therein contained being necessarily ex parte, and unaccompanied by any evidence or pleadings on the other side." So it is said by Lord HARDWICK in Roach v. Hall (2 Atk. 469): "Nothing is more incumbent upon courts of justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented; nor is there anything of more pernicious consequences than to prejudice the minds of the public against the persons concerned as parties in a cause before the cause is finally heard. It has always been my opinion, as well as the opinion of those who have sat before me, that such a proceeding ought to be discountenanced." With these and other cases before him it was clearly the duty of the VICE-CHANCELLOR to grant the injunction prayed for. A good deal of feeling and sometimes acrimony is no doubt engendered in the breasts of litigants during the progress of an action in which they are parties. This feeling, however natural, will not be allowed to carry either of them to such lengths as that pursued by the plaintiffs in Bowden v. Russell. The reasons upon which the interference of the court is founded are so manifest that any lengthy reference to them would be useless labour. The simple fact is that courts of justice look with disfavour upon anything or any conduct that tends, even in a slight degree, to import prejudice into a case; a fortiori, it will not allow either a plaintiff or a defendant to make use of legal forms for the purpose of destroying his opponent's credibility before the real merits of the action are tested.

THE decision of the Court of Appeal in Westhead v. Westhead (L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 1), has been cited with success on several occasions within the last few days as an authority that the Court of Appeal cannot hear an appeal from an order of the Judge Ordinary of the Divorce Court. The point really in dispute was whether the jurisdiction of the full Court of Divorce had been abolished. In Wallis v. Wallis, decided on the 5th instant, Sir J. HANNEN had refused to vary the registrar's order directing a husband, whose wife had obtained judicial separation, to pay alimony to the amount of £150 a year. The husband appealed to the Court of Appeal. So in Robinson v. Robinson, decided on the 6th inst. an appeal was made from a decision of the same Judge to the Court of Appeal. In the latter case the learned Judge had refused a new trial on a petition for dissolution of marriage. In both cases the objection taken was that, on the authority of Westhead v. Westhead, an appeal lay to the full Court of Divorce, and not to the Court of Appeal. Against this it was urged that all the courts mentioned in the Judicature Act 1873, including the Divorce Court, were united in the Supreme Court, which was itself divided into the High Court of Justice and the Court of Appeal. The jurisdiction of the latter, it was said, extends to the hearing of appeals from the Probate and Divorce Divisions as well as from other divisions of the High Court. It was also insisted that the full Court of Divorce, constituted by the provisions of the Divorce Acts 1857, 1858, and 1860, had been impliedly abolished by the Judicature Act, inasmuch as that Act contained no provision for its continuance. In support of this view reference was made to the 44th section of the Judicature Act 1873, by which divisional courts might be held for the transaction of any part of the business assigned to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court. The reasoning, however, on behalf of the appellants did not persuade the court to hear the appeal, and it must now be taken as settled that the Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal from an order of the Judge Ordinary of the Divorce Court. Such appeals must be brought, as before, to the full Court of Divorce. The opinion of LORD JUSTICE JAMES, as given in Robinson v. Robinson, was to the effect that there was nothing in the Judicature Acts to take away the jurisdiction of the full Court of Divorce. That court was a part of the Divorce Court, and its decision was made final in such cases. By sect. 20 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876 it is provided that when by Act of Parliament the decision of any court or Judge whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court of Justice is to be final, no appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal. His Lordship was quite of opinion that although there might have been an appeal from such court under the Judicature Act as it originally stood, yet it was impossible to say that such right had not been taken away by the Act of 1876. LORD JUSTICE MELLISH concurred in this view. The only real question, he thought, was whether the jurisdiction of the full Court of Divorce was abolished by the Judicature Acts, or was transferred to the High Court. "There are no words abolishing it," said his Lordship, and there are general words in sect. 16 amply sufficient to transfer to the Judges of the High Court all the jurisdiction which was previously vested in the Judges of the common law courts. Before the Act of 1876 there might have been a question whether a party appealing was compelled to go to the full court first, or had the option of going to the Court of Appeal at once. He must, I think, have gone to the full court first, and afterwards to the Court of Appeal. But the right of appeal to this court in such cases was taken away by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act of 1876." It is perhaps a misfortune that the Court of Appeal could not see its way to declaring that the full Court of Divorce had been abolished by the operation of the Judicature Acts. We say this upon considerations of convenience to suitors and uniformity of practice. During the argument in one of the above cases it was pointed out that the full Court of Divorce rarely sits, hence the conclusion to which the Court of Appeal has come may, though this is the fault of the Legislature, have the effect in many cases of deferring the ultimate decision.

LIMITATIONS IN MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS IN FAVOUR OF CHILDREN BY FORMER MARRIAGE.

THE recently reported case of Price v. Jenkins (L. Rep. 4 Ch. Div. 483), to which a brief allusion was made not long ago in these columns, is one of considerable importance. Its importance is two-fold. In the first place the decision itself is an important addition to the law relating to marriage settlements; in the second place the judgment of the learned Judge (Vice-Chancellor Hall) before whom the question at issue was argued, contains an elaborate examination of the long string of authorities from Jenkins v. Keymis (1 Lev. 150) to Clark v. Wright (6 H. & N. 849.) The actual point upon which the learning of counsel was brought to bear may be shortly stated thus: Where there exists in a marriage settlement a limitation in favour of a son of the settlor by a former marriage, is the title of that son good as against a subsequent purchaser from the settlor (i.e., the intended husband)?

In Jenkins v. Keymis N. was a tenant for life, C., his son, was tenant in tail. In consideration of a marriage between C. and B. and her portion of £2500, N. levied a fine to his own use for life, remainder to C. and B. for their lives, remainder to the heirs of the body of C. and B., remainder to the heirs of the body of C., with power to N. to charge the premises with £2500. N. and C. subsequently joined in a mortgage. Could this mortgage defeat the limitation in favour of the issue of the second marriage? It was held that it could not. In commenting upon this decision, it was remarked by Vice-Chancellor Hall that "It does not appear how the money (the £2500) was paid, or to whom it was paid, but the money was paid, and that was the consideration for the settlement being made in that form, viz., in consideration of 2500l. coming from the lady, a settlement was made which included the children of the son by a second marriage. There was, therefore, a money consideration which could not be severed and separated. That consideration ran through the whole of the settlement and the whole of the limitations. This case with others is cited in support of the principle that generally in cases where the property settled belonged partly to the husband or wife and partly to a third person, their mutual interchange of interests will make valid any limitations to collateral branches which were part of the bargain. (See May's Voluntary and Fraudulent Alienations of Property, p. 336.)

This case, then, does not supply a ratio decidendi for that of Price v. Jenkins. The defendants chiefly relied upon Newstead v. Searles (1 Atk. 265) and Clarke v. Wright (ubi sup.), contending that the former was a direct authority in his favour. In Newstead v. Searles a widow, at the time of her second marriage, had two grandchildren, for whom she wished to make provision. Accordingly, acting with her intended husband's consent, she settled her lands equally upon the two grandchildren in the event of there being no issue of the marriage. The limitation in favour of the grandchildren was held good by Lord Hardwicke as against creditors. His Lordship was of opinion that if the case was taken with all its circumstances the settlement was not voluntary; and referring to Jenkins v. Keymis, went on to say, "The present is a stronger case, for here are reciprocal considerations, both on the part of the husband and the wife, by the provision under the articles for the children of the second marriage." The reciprocal considerations here referred to were, as pointed out by Vice-Chancellor Hall in Price v. Jenkins, that inasmuch as the property in question was settled by one limitation in favour of the issue of the two marriages, it was governed by the rules which obtain where limitations in favour of strangers are mixed up with other limitations.

If the circumstances of this case are compared with those of Price v. Jenkins, a certain similarity will be obvious. In the latter the defendant upon his second marriage settled a piece of land upon trust for himself and his intended wife, during their joint lives, and for the survivor for life, and after the death of the survivor, for his son absolutely. The intended wife's property was settled as to part for her separate use, and as to the rest upon such trusts as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for her for life, for her separate use, and after her decease in trust for her children or tenants in common. The similarity, however, is more apparent than real, and the ratio decidendi of Newstead v. Searles cannot be adopted unless it can be said that that case is an authority for the general principle that a settlement made on the occasion of a second marriage in favour of the issue of a former marriage is valid as against purchasers for valuable consideration. In the opinion of Vice-Chancellor Hall it is no such authority. It was a case decided on the authority of Jenkins v. Keymis, and, said his Lordship, it came within the class of cases in which limitations in favour of strangers, and mixed up with limitation in favour of persons who are not strangers, so that they are all to take together, or in a certain order of limitations, and such taking necessitates the court holding to be valid the limitations in favour of those who are not within the consideration. The court in such cases holds the whole to be effectual, in order that it may give effect to that which, being within the consideration, must have effect given to it." Adopting this view of the principle deducible from the reported cases, there can be no doubt of the correctness of the decision in Price v. Jenkins.

Some of the remarks made from the Bench in the case of Clarke v. Wright are, to say the least, inconsistent with the principle here enunciated. There a widow upon her second marriage, settled her real property in trust for her herself for life, with remainder as to part to her husband for life, remainder to the use of her illegitimate son in fee, and as to the residue to her son in fee in case he should attain the age of twenty-one. The question the court was called upon to decide was whether the limitation in the marriage settlement to the illegitimate son was good as against a mortgagee to whom the property had been mortgaged by the husband and wife. The question was answered in the affirmative by the Courts of Exchequer and Exchequer Chamber, though the reasons given by the various Judges for their judgment are not consistent with one another. The Court of Exchequer was of opinion that Newstead v. Searles was a direct authority that a settlement by a widow about to marry upon her children by a former marriage, is good against a subsequent mortgagee. A careful examination of the facts will show that that case is not an authority to that extent. It is said in effect in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers that if a stipulation on the part of one of the contracting parties that the other contracting party shall settle some of his own property in a particular way, cannot be presumed or proved, the limitation must be considered voluntary and void as against a subsequent bond fide purchaser. This view was adopted by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Colling v. Wright (6 H. & N. at p. 865), and the same learned judge went on to say, "Yet when as in Newstead v. Searles and Clayton v. Earl of Winton, the limitations so interfere with those which would naturally be made in favour of the husband, wife, and issue, or to indicate that the limitations must have been discussed, and made part of the marriage contract, part of the reciprocal consideration between the husband and wife, that presumption is rebutted, and the limitations are not voluntary." Vice-Chancellor Hall agreed with this, but considered it inapplicable. In his view the bargain between the defendant and his second wife was that the property should in substance, so far as regarded the issue of the intended marriage and the intended wife, not be brought into settlement at all, but be left to the intended husband to make a settlement upon her. As a matter of convenience and economy, this was done by the same instrument as the settlement of the wife's property. In his Lordship's opinion the question to be asked is, Can it, or can it not be collected from the settlement that the intended wife stipulated that the intended husband should settle some of his own property upon the child by a former wife. This question was answered in Price v. Jenkins in the negative. We think the decision in harmony with previous authorities if these are rigorously examined.

THE POWER OF AN ARBITRATOR TO CERTIFY FOR COSTS.

In the case of Bedwell v. Wood, heard on March 5, the Divisional Court had under their consideration questions of considerable importance affecting the powers of an arbitrator. The action was brought to recover £21 12s., being a balance of account for work and labour done. On the 4th Dec. 1876, the action was referred under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 3, to the certificate of Master Brewer, who was to have all the powers of certifying and amending of a judge at Nisi Prius, the costs of the cause and of the reference to be in the discretion of the master. By his award, dated the 11th Jan. 1877, the master certified and awarded the plaintiff £6 1s. 10d., and directed that the costs of the cause and reference be borne and paid by the defendant. In this award, however, the master gave no certificate that in his opinion the action had been properly brought in the Superior Court. Upon a master at chambers being applied to, to tax the costs, he refused to do so, on the ground that under the County Court Act 1867, s. 5, they were not recoverable in the action, in consequence of the sum recovered being under £20, and there being no certificate as required by that section.

On the 2nd Feb., on an ex parte application by the plaintiff's solicitor, Master Brewer indorsed on his award the following words: "I think the plaintiff should have his costs;" and on the 6th Feb. he made the further indorsement: "I certify there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Superior Court." Accordingly on this certificate the costs were taxed and allowed.

On these facts three questions arose: (1) Whether the Master had any power at all to certify for costs; (2) Whether he had authority to indorse his certificate on the award after it had been taken up; and (3) Whether, inasmuch as in the body of the award he had in terms directed that the costs should be paid by the defendant, any further certificate was necessary.

As to the first point, the case of Moore v. Watson (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 314), would seem to be an authority on the general principle of a Master's authority. There an action of contract was compulsorily referred to a master under sect. 3 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and it was ordered that the costs of the cause should abide the event, and that the costs of the reference should be in the discretion of the master. The master awarded to the plaintiff a sum less than £20, and directed the defendant to pay the costs of the reference. But it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to these costs; for that they could only be recovered upon judgment entered on the award, and that being for a sum not exceeding £20, the County Court deprived the plaintiff of costs.

But the Divisional Court thought it unnecessary to deal with that case, inasmuch as in Bedwell v. Wood all the powers of certifying and amending of a Judge at Nisi Prius were given to the master, and they held that this clearly included the power of certifying for costs. Mr. Justice Byles, however, in the case of Wigens v. Cook (28 L. J. 315, C. P.) seems not to have been of that opinion, for though the case had there been referred to an arbitrator, who was to have "all the powers as to certifying of a Judge at Nisi Prius," he said, "As to our sending the case back to the arbitrator, if we were to do so it could only mislead him, by inducing him to think he had power to do what I think he has no power to do, viz., to certify for costs."

On the second point the court held that the authority of the master expired after his award was made and published; and that he had no power to certify afterwards, unless the award was remitted to him by the court. This they held on the authority of Spain v. Cadell (8 M. & W. 129), in which Baron Alderson laid down the law thus: "No doubt the arbitrator, who is invested with this power by the consent of the parties, must, in all substantial matters, follow the rules laid down in the statute for the guidance of the judge, that is, he must give his opinion upon the matter immediately; he cannot make his award at one time, and certify as to the costs at a subsequent time. That is in substance the power possessed by the Judge at Nisi Prius, which the arbitrator, although he cannot follow it literally, is bound to follow cy près, the mode of doing which is by immediately inserting his certificate in the award." And the same principles were acted on in Geeve v. Gorton (3 D. & L. 481).

That case was as follows: The cause came on for trial before a special jury, and was referred to an arbitrator, who was to have the same power to certify as a judge at Nisi Prius. The award was made on the 6th August, and, after the first four days of the following term, the arbitrator certified for a special jury. It was held that the certificate was too late. One objection in this case was that the certificate was not given immediately after the verdict, within the words of 6 Geo. 4 c. 50, s. 34; but it was also objected that the arbitrator did not certify until after his authority had expired. To this it was answered by the counsel on the other side that, though an arbitrator cannot make an alteration in his award, he yet may do any act for the purpose of carrying it into effect; to which Chief Baron Pollock replied: "Not if the parties neglect to call his attention to it until after his authority has expired;" and Baron Parke said: "Surely it was intended that the arbitrator should make his award once for all; he ought to have included the costs of the special jury in his award." On the third point—viz., whether any certificate was, in fact, necessary, the court gave no decision. The case of Smith v. Edge (33 L. J. 9, Ex.) was cited as an authority for the proposition that the words of an award cannot be taken by implication as a certificate. That case certainly does not seem to bear out such a proposition; but the proposition would seem to be a sound one, for the words of the County Court Act are clear that a certificate to a certain effect is to be given, and we doubt very much whether the law would imply that such a direction has been carried out unless the certificate be given in plain words. But it is tolerably clear that no such certificate could be implied in the case of Bedwell v. Wood. The certificate required is a certificate that the action was properly brought in the Superior Court. That can hardly be implied from a general direction as to costs, which involves distinctly different considerations.

AGENCY—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO THIRD PARTIES TO PAY OVER MONEYS.

THE ratio decidendi adopted in the case of Pond v. Underwood (2 Ld. Raym. 1210), decided in 1705, is applicable in the present day. This case overruled Jacob v. Allen (1 Salk. 27), and has received the sanction of Lord Mansfield's approval. This was an action by an executor for money received by the defendant, and owing to the testator. At the trial it appeared that before the will was found administration was granted to the testator's sister, who gave to the defendant a warrant of attorney to receive the money in question. He received the money accordingly, and paid it over to the administratrix before any notice of the will. Lord Holt non-suited the plaintiff, on the ground that no action lay against the defendant, as he had paid the money over to his principal without notice.

In Sadler v. Evans (4 Burr. 198 Ex.), decided in 1766, the defendant was Lady Windsor's receiver. An action was brought against him for money received. The action was really brought with the intention to try the right of Lady W. to a certain quitrent. Baron Perrott non-suited the plaintiff, being of opinion that the right to an inheritance of the principal could not be tried in an action for money had and received brought against the agent. A rule to set aside the non-suit was discharged. From some of the observations of the court it might be inferred that they thought the general rule to be that payment or no payment by the agent was immaterial; but these remarks must be taken subject to the particular circumstances of the case. Lord Mansfield distinctly said that when payments are made to a known agent the action ought to be brought against the principal, "unless in special cases, or under notice, or mala fide."

Butler v. Harrison (Cowp. 565), decided in 1777, was an action for money had and received, to recover a sum of £2100 paid as due upon a policy of insurance to the defendant as agent for the insured. The agent placed the money to the account of the principal. After payment, the plaintiffs discovered that the money was not due, and gave notice to that effect to the agent. At the trial Lord Mansfield left it to the jury to say whether the action could be maintained against the defendant as agent, and ruled that it depended on whether the fact that the defendant had placed the money to the account of his principal was equivalent to a payment of it over. The jury found for the defendant. A rule nisi for a new trial was made absolute by the court. The written judgment was read by Lord Mansfield, "In general, the principle of law is clear," said his Lordship, "that if money be mispaid to an agent expressly for the use of his principal, and the agent has paid it over, he is not liable in an action by the person who mispaid it. . . . On the other hand, it is just that as the agent ought not to lose, he should not be a gainer by the mistake. And, therefore, if after the payment so made to him, and before he has paid the money over to his principal, the person corrects the mistake, the agent cannot afterwards pay it over to his principal without making himself liable to the real owner for the amount." His Lordship was of opinion that the question was one of law, and not of fact, and that the direction to the jury should be that if they were satisfied the money was paid by mistake, and that the defendant's situation was not altered by any new circumstance since, they ought to find for the plaintiff.

In Bolton v. Puller (1 B. & P. 539), decided in 1796, A. and Co. were bankers at Liverpool, and two members of the firm, namely, C. and D., carried on a separate business in London. The plaintiffs having accepted bills payable to the house of C. and D., employed A. and Co. to get them paid accordingly, and deposited with them good bills indorsed by them for the purpose of enabling them so to do. A. and Co. debited the plaintiffs in account for his acceptances, and credited him for all the bills which he deposited. Some of the bills so deposited by the plaintiff were remitted by A. and Co. to C. and D., upon the general account between the two houses. Before any of the acceptances of the plaintiff became due both houses failed, and J. S. was obliged to pay his own acceptances. The Court of Common Pleas held that the assignees of C. and D., namely, the defendants, were entitled to retain against the plaintiff the bills remitted to them by A. and Co. The judgment of the court was delivered by Chief Justice Eyre, who treated the case as a middle one between those in which it has been held that bills in the hands of a factor in the event of a bankruptcy must be delivered up, subject only to rights of lien; and those in which it is held that if indorsed bills are deposited with a banker, and they are by him negotiated to a third person, though the purpose for which they were deposited should be ever so cruelly disappointed by his becoming bankrupt, the original owner can have no claim to recover them in trover against this third person. "The true nature of that transaction," said his lordship, "has been warmly disputed in the course of the argument. Bolton paid into his banker's hands these bills on his general account for a particular purpose. This has been called an appropriation; and legal consequences are deduced from them as if appropriation was a technical term, or at least was used in some definite or precise sense; whereas no term in perpetual use can be more general or more uncertain in its import. . . . So far from being appropriated to any particular purpose in the strict sense of the word, the bills in specie were not intended to be applied to any other purpose than to be converted into cash, in order to increase Mr. Bolton's credit with his bankers, and in the nature of things they could not be applied in specie to the particular purpose of paying Mr. Bolton's acceptances in London. These bills, at least the bills in question, were remitted to the house in London on the general account of the banking houses. We cannot think that there was a misapplication, or that the confidence of Mr. Bolton was abused."

The decision was mainly relied on by Vice-Chancellor Malins in Johnson v. Roberts (L. Rep. 10 Chan. 505), decided in 1875. The plaintiffs were customers of a County Bank, the defendants were the London agents of that bank. The acceptances of the plaintiff were usually made payable at the London bank. The plaintiff having paid into their account to the former bank the sum of 2422l. 8s. in cash, notes, and bills, to meet acceptances, that bank sent a printed letter with the bills and notes, "Be pleased to make undermentioned payments, &c., at the debit of the County Bank." A few days afterwards that bank stopped payment, the defendants refused to pay the amounts due on the acceptances, but retained the bills and notes as having been remitted to them in the ordinary course and without any reference to the acceptances. A bill praying a declaration that the defendants were trustees of the bills and notes was dismissed. This decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal.

In Stevens v. Hill (5 Esp. 24), decided in 1865, Lord Ellenborough ruled that when a bill is drawn on an agent, and made payable out of a particular fund, if the agent says he will pay it when he gets money of the principal, this is binding upon him, and if he gets money at a subsequent time he is bound to pay the bill. His Lordship remarked that a similar case of an army agent had been tried before Lord Kenyon, in which case the agent had promised to pay the draft of a person on him, and, having neglected to do so, an action being brought, Lord Kenyon ruled that the promise of the agent was an appropriation of so much to the use of the holder of the draft, and made him liable on the receipt of any money upon the credit of which it was drawn.

Williams v. Everett (14 East, 582), decided in 1811, was another action for money had and received brought to recover £300, being part of the amount of a bill remitted by one Kelly, resident abroad, to the defendants, his bankers, in England. In his letter accompanying the bill K. said, "I remit you by the Warley £1126 2s., which I particularly request you will order to be paid to the following persons, who will produce their letters of advice from me." Amongst the persons named was the plaintiff. Before the bills became due the plaintiff gave Everett notice of a letter he had received from K. ordering his debt to be paid out of that remittance. At the same time he offered the defendants an indemnity. The latter, however, refused to indorse the bill away or to act upon the letter. The question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to receive from the defendants the amount of the debt due to him from K. out of the money which was admitted to have been received when the bill became due. At the trial Lord Ellenborough nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that as the defendants had renounced the terms on which the bills were remitted before the money was actually received, the money was only money had and received to the use of the remitter of the bill. The ruling was upheld by the full court. The judgment was delivered by Lord Ellenborough, who said, "It will be observed that there is no assent on the part of the defendants to hold this money for the purposes mentioned in the letter; but, on the contrary, an express refusal to the creditor so to do. . . . By the act of receiving the bill the defendants agree to hold it till paid, and its contents when paid, for the use of the remitter. It is entire to the remitter to give and countermand his own directions respecting the bill as often as he pleases, and the persons to whom the bill is remitted may still hold the bill till received, and its amount when received, for the use of the remitter himself, until by some engagement entered into by themselves with the person who is the object of the remittance, they have precluded themselves from so doing, and have appropriated the remittance to the use of such person. After such a circumstance they cannot retract the consent they may have once given, but are bound to hold it for the use of the appointee."

The court stated a hypothetical case as means of testing the defendants' liability. Suppose the defendants had been robbed of the cash or notes in which the bills in question had been paid, or suppose they had been lost or destroyed, who would have borne the loss, the remitter K., or the creditors in whose favour he had directed the application of the money, assuming that the defendants were not liable? The doctrine laid down in this case was applied in Brind v. Hampshire (1 M. and W. 365); Scott v. Porcher (3 Meriv. 652). This right of the remitter to make any new appropriation of his money as he might think fit, and so relieve the agent of liability upon the original appropriation, was recognised in Stewart v. Fry (7 Taunt. 33, 9, 1817). There the acceptor of a bill remitted funds to his bankers, the defendants, to meet it. The defendants finding the bill was sent back as dishonoured, remitted the money to the acceptor. Upon a subsequent presentment of the bill, they refused payment, and the court held that they were not liable to the holder for the amount remitted. On the same grounds where the maker of the promissory note paid money into the hands of an agent to retire it, and the agent tenders the money to the holder of the note, on condition of having it delivered up, but the note being mislaid, this condition is not complied with, and the agent afterwards becomes bankrupt, with the money in his hands, Lord Ellenborough ruled that the maker was still responsible on the note: Dent v. Dunn (3 Camp. 296, 1812).

THE NEW COUNTY COURT BILL.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

THE new County Court Bill, upon which you have commented in your last two numbers, proposes to establish five principal County Court districts under seven Judges, the centres of those districts being Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Bradford, Birmingham, Bristol, Newcastle, and Durham. No doubt, if the proposed plan is carried out, the first six named places are, from their importance, very properly chosen as principal courts; but I fail to see why Newcastle and Durham have been selected in preference to some other large towns, unless Newcastle is so favoured from the fact of the introducer of the Bill being member for that town and the framer of it the County Court Judge of Northumberland. Upon referring to the Parliamentary return of all plaints entered in the County Courts in England in 1875 (the last return yet printed, I find that in Newcastle there were 5268, and in the whole of Northumberland, including Gateshead (County Circuit 1), only 10,681. In Durham 4512, and in the whole of that circuit (No. 2) 19,042, while in Darlington and Barnard Castle from Circuit 15, which it is proposed to add to the new district, 3164, giving a total of 32,887 plaints; but to obtain so large a total the whole of Circuits 1 and 2 and part of circuit 15 are amalgamated, and a very large area (above a hundred miles in length from north to south) included, the effect of which must necessarily be to cause great expense to suitors and their witnesses, who will have to travel long distances to Newcastle or Durham to try their actions above £20. From the same returns we find that Sheffield had 20,761 plaints, and Rotherham in the same circuit, 4481. Surely there is more reason to make Sheffield a principal County Court or centre of a district than Newcastle and Durham. Nottingham, which had 11,634 plaints, considerably more than two towns of Newcastle and Durham put together, or than the whole of Circuit 1, is neither made a principal court or part of a new district. Hull, a more important seaport than any in Northumberland or Durham, and with 7083 plaints, is also omitted, and so are Leicester (9771 plaints), Dudley (8502), and Hanley, Burslem, and Tunstall, with 9734. It appears to me that the Bill, either does not go far enough in not making m-- principal courts, or that if it is to be considered as an experiment, or a commencement, that the largest and most important towns should have been chosen in the first instance, which appears not to have been done, except in the cases of Newcastle and Derham.

It has always seemed to me that a great improvement might be made in the County Court system and in the efficiency of the courts, without such a great alteration as is contemplated, or inviting so much opposition as the present Bill will probably meet with, and creating so much dissatisfaction in the large towns, which it is proposed for the future shall only be visited by a judicial registrar, while the important cases are to go to another place for trial, thereby occasioning much expense and loss of time to suitors, witnesses, and professional gentlemen, who have for a number of years been accustomed to have their cases tried and decided at their own homes. The present County Court districts or circuits, with some slight alterations made from time to time, have existed for the last thirty years; since then railways have greatly increased and towns sprung up, which were then mere villages or did not exist at all. It is time that these circuits were re-arranged all through the country, and the business more equalised. To begin with the north for example. In Circuit No. 1, as already stated, in 1875 there were 10,681 plaintiffs; in Circuit 2, 19,042, nearly double. Several of the towns in the northern part of that circuit might very well be added to No. 1, and Stockton, Darlington, and Barnard Castle, which formerly belonged to Circuit 2, but were some years ago taken away, because the circuit was too large, might be restored. This would relieve Circuit 15 of a good deal of work, and it again might have towns added to it from another circuit. If this plan were pursued throughout the country I have little doubt the number of circuits and Judges might be reduced. I know that the number of plaintiffs in a circuit is not always a fair criterion by which the amount of labour a County Court Judge has to undergo can be arrived at; because in many circuits, though the number of cases are comparatively few, the number of places at which he holds circuit are more numerous, and he may have to sit as many days and travel further than a Judge who tries many more cases. But there are many places, and especially in the agricultural districts, which are very small, and where courts are held only once in two or three months, and at which the Judge's work occupies a very short time when he arrives at them. Many of these courts—now that railway communication is so much easier than it was thirty years ago—might be abolished, and the business sent to the nearest town of any importance at a very small inconvenience to the public, whilst the salaries of the registrars and other costs of those courts would be saved. Such saving, together with some probable diminution in the number of judges, would go a long way towards paying for some fair increase in the judges' salaries, which it seems to be generally thought they are fairly entitled to. I see no reason why some jurisdiction might not be given to the present registrars to try small disputed accounts, which would greatly relieve the Judge, who would have more time to try the important cases, the number of which might then very well be increased by giving him extended jurisdiction. I certainly think it would be much better to give jurisdiction in small matters to the present registrars, than to establish a new kind of Judge under the name of Judicial Registrars at a large salary, and who would, in fact, be very much the same as the County Court Judges were when first established. Surely the country hardly requires three classes of County Court Judges, superior ones at £3000 a year, ordinary ones at £1800, and inferior ones at £1200.

LAW LIBRARY.

The Principles of Punishment as applied in the Administration of the Criminal Law. By EDWARD W. COX, Serjeant-at-Law, Recorder of Portsmouth. London: LAW TIMES Office.

PUBLIC attention has been so often directed to the administration of our criminal law, that any writer who discussed the question with but a moderate amount of ability, would be sure to find a ready audience. The question, however, is one which from its very nature cannot be adequately treated from a merely theoretical point of view. A writer, who has been able to test his theories by a long and varied experience, will not only find an audience, but must command attention. It is in this particular that Serjeant Cox has an advantage over ordinary writers. With an experience extending over a number of years, during which he has tried "upwards of 13,000 prisoners for almost every crime except murder," the learned Serjeant may well say that the experience gathered in the discharge of those official duties could scarcely fail to teach some useful lessons. Upon this point there can be no doubt.

Turning to the contents of the book itself we find that the subject is distributed into twenty-three chapters. In these are treated, The Purpose and Principle of Punishment; Legal Classification of Crimes; The Province of the Judge; Classification of Criminals; The Character of the Criminal; Circumstances of Aggravation; Mitigation of Punishment; Abuses of the Criminal Law; Costs; Compensation; Restitution; Juries and Verdicts; Summary Convictions; Payment of Penalties and Costs; Rewards; Bail, and the like. Under these various headings will be found the results of much experience and many suggestions of value. Starting with the principle that the sentences of the different courts are practically regulated by no rule, as "they are not based upon any principles capable of being generally recognised and acted upon," the learned author gives in the book before us his contribution towards mitigating, if not removing altogether, this acknowledged evil. In fact, in the chapters already noticed, he designed, as he has said in the preface, "only an endeavour to trace certain principles, or, to be more accurate, certain considerations, that might possibly assist the judge or magistrate in approximating to a just determination in punishments, so that good reasons might be given for awarding the various penalties to the various offenders." The learned author has succeeded in attaining the object he set before him at the outset, and has published suggestions which cannot but be of great value to all judges and magistrates in the administration of the Criminal Law.

LEGISLATION AND JURISPRUDENCE.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 2.
BANKRUPTCY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, laying on the table and moving the first reading of a Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to Bankruptcy, said that when it was printed and in the hands of members a more convenient opportunity would arise for stating its provisions, and the respects in which it differed from the Bill on the same subject which passed their Lordships' House last session.

The Bill was then read a first time.

REAL PROPERTY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he wished to lay on the table and move the first reading of two other Bills on somewhat minute subjects connected with the law of the country. One was a Bill to amend the law relating to contingent remainders—a subject the bare mention of which showed that it was of a somewhat technical character. The other Bill was one for the amendment of two Acts passed in the present reign to exonerate real estate from certain charges, and which had been found defective in operation.

On the motion of the noble and learned Lord, the two Bills were read a first time.

THE BURIAL LAWS.

The Duke of RICHMOND and GORDON gave notice that on Tuesday next he would introduce a Bill to consolidate and amend the Burial Acts, and at the same time explain the Bill and make a statement.

PUBLIC RECORDS OFFICE BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that their Lordships go into committee on this Bill, said he only proposed on this occasion that the committee should be taken pro forma, in order that the Bill might be reprinted with amendments. Since it was laid on the table, representations had been made from various quarters that it was desirable that the scheme of the measure should be carried further, so as to include the destruction of documents which had accumulated in counties, and were now entirely useless. He proposed, therefore, to introduce clauses to effect that object, and their Lordships would be better judges of how far they might with safety go in the direction referred to when they saw those clauses in print. Also, he found there was a feeling in some quarters, and it was one in which he sympathised, that, before any documents were destroyed, there should be laid before Parliament a schedule containing a description of the documents which it was intended to destroy. He proposed to introduce such a schedule in the Bill, and this afforded another reason for reprinting the Bill itself. (Hear, hear.) Their Lordships then went into committee on the Bill.

The Earl of HARROWBY suggested that the Bill should be referred to a select committee, of which the Duke of Somerset be Chairman.

The LORD CHANCELLOR observed that his noble friend (the Earl of Harrowby) was for proceeding with great avidity, because he not only proposed a select committee, but selected a chairman for that committee. (Laughter.) No better selection could be made, but at present they were only at the stage of committee, and he had suggested that the Bill should be reprinted in order that their Lordships might see the proposals of the Government in their entirety. If when those proposals were before the House any strong feeling was expressed on the part of their Lordships for referring the Bill to a select committee, he should offer no opposition to that course. In fact, the desire of the Master of the Rolls was not to act without authority in reference to the important matter of the destruction of documents, but rather to have all responsibility removed from him as far as it was possible to remove it. (Hear, hear.) The Bill then passed through committee pro forma.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE COLERIDGE.

VISCOUNT MIDDLETON said he had given notice of his intention to ask the Lord Chancellor whether his attention had been called to a report in the Times of the refusal by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge to allow the costs of a conviction for night poaching, when the learned judge was stated to have used these words:—"That it was the first occasion any such application had been made to him, and he hoped it would be the last, for he certainly never should order the costs in any such case. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he was only following the dicta of eminent judges. The law ought undoubtedly to be enforced, but, as the law protected the amusements of rich people, they must pay for its enforcement." He had also given notice to ask whether that report was correct, and if so, whether the ruling of Lord Coleridge was in conformity with the practice of her Majesty's judges. He had purposely given a notice sufficiently long to enable the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack to communicate with Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, and to enable the learned judge to return such reply as he might deem advisable. However, since he put his notice on the paper a change had occurred in the circumstances of the case. Last evening a question on the subject was put and answered in another place, and, as the answer was in the shape of a letter from Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, he hoped their Lordships would not consider him to be out of order if he referred to it. The letter stated that the report, with the exception of one word—the variation in which did not at all affect the questions of which he had given notice—was correct, and it further stated that several learned judges, none of whom were now living, but whose names were mentioned with respect by the Bar, took the same view as that adopted by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, and that their decisions on the point formed precedents on which he had acted. He had been unable to verify those authorities, and probably they were not in print; but as one and probably more of those decisions had come within the Lord Chief Justice's own knowledge, he thought their Lordships might take it that the learned judge's statement on that head was correct. Thus two portions of the question he had intended to ask had been answered. He would not conceal from their Lordships that he was strongly tempted to ask if this was the judicial utterance of the Lord Chief Justice—that he was determined to refuse costs invariably in all such cases, irrespective of what the circumstances might be, and that the amusements of the rich must be protected at the expense of the rich. He would not, however, enter into that point either, because the circuit had not closed and the noble and learned Lord was not in his place. He had been most anxious to ascertain at the earliest possible moment the correctness of the newspaper report, but, as the question he would have put to elicit information on that head had been answered by anticipation, he would not further take up the time of the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—If I rightly understand my noble friend, he does not put any question to me. I am glad he has not done so, for, had he done so, I should have replied that, though I should have had great pleasure in becoming the medium of any communication which the Lord Chief Justice might desire to make to your lordships, on the other hand, I have no jurisdiction over and no responsibility at all for the Lord Chief Justice, and no means of ascertaining the correctness of the observation he is reported to have made which is not open to any other member of your lordships' House. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of MALMESBURY, in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice, did not intend to go into a discussion of the subject. He must, however, say that if the Game Laws did not rest on their own merits they ought to be revised. It was impossible to say that laws made for the preservation of wild animals indigenous to this country were enacted for any one class of the people. Any amusement which was derived in consequence of that preservation was shared in by the poor as well as by the rich; and the Bill passed last Session for the Preservation of Wild Birds was passed more in the interests of the poor than in those of the rich. He protested against the inference likely to be drawn from the observations of the noble and learned Lord Chief Justice. Their lordships adjourned at twenty-five minutes to six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 5.

LORD COLERIDGE ON POACHING CASES.

Sir C. LEGARD asked whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been called to the refusal of the costs of prosecution by Lord Coleridge on the conviction of three men for night poaching, and to his having said, as reported in the Times, "that it was the first occasion any such application had been made to him, and he hoped it would be the last, for he certainly never should order the costs in any such case. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he was only following the dicta of eminent judges. The law ought undoubtedly to be enforced, but as the law protected the amusements of rich people, they must pay for its enforcement;" if he would inform the House what were the dicta on which Lord Coleridge relied, who were the judges who had uttered them, and whether the doctrine laid down was in conformity with the law of the land.

Mr. CROSS.—As I, of course, have no jurisdiction in this matter, I think the best thing I can do is to read to the House a letter which I have received from the noble lord:

"Sir,—I am much obliged to you for calling my attention to Sir Charles Legard's question, of which I should have been otherwise entirely unaware, for that gentleman has not extended to me what I think is the usual courtesy of inquiring whether words which are intended to be made the subject of question or comment were used in fact by the person to whom they are ascribed. Of the general accuracy of the report quoted from The Times I have no reason to complain; I did not, however, use the word 'dicta,' but the word 'practice,' which makes some difference. As far as I know, there are no dicta on the subject; nor is it likely, from the nature of the case, that there should be. I spoke of the practice of judges, and the judges I had in my mind at the time I spoke were Justices Maule, Erskine, Patteson, and my own father. I believe, as a matter of fact, the list might be largely extended, but these are enough. I did not, however, and do not, wish to shield myself under any authority, however venerable. I acted according to law, with, I hope, a proper sense of duty, on my own sole responsibility, and (disclaiming offence) I must add that I am not accountable for my acts to any member of the House of Commons." ("Oh.") "A letter to the Secretary of State to be read in the House of Commons is not a convenient medium for any discussion of the general question. But by law the costs in prosecutions for breaches of the game laws cannot, without the authority of the judge, be inflicted on the ratepayers; and the offence tried before me at Durham is an offence which, by law, justices of the peace cannot try. The experience of other men may be different, but this was the first occasion on which any attempt has been made before me to inflict the costs of such a prosecution upon the ratepayers. I refused them, and shall probably continue to refuse them, upon grounds which appear to me conclusive, but with the statement of which I do not think it necessary to trouble you or the House of Commons." (Hear, hear.)

Sir C. LEGARD intimated that, on the earliest opportunity, he would call attention to the subject and move a resolution. (Cheers.)

EXETER MAGISTRATES.

In answer to a question by Sir E. WATKIN respecting appointments on the Commission of the Peace for Exeter,

Mr. CROSS read the following communication from the Lord Chancellor:

"The Lord Chancellor appointed the four gentlemen alluded to by Sir E. Watkin to be magistrates of the city of Exeter on the 26th Jan. last. Before appointing these gentlemen the Lord Chancellor satisfied himself that they were in all respects highly eligible for the office. They are all gentlemen of high standing, three of them having served the office of Mayor of Exeter, besides holding other public positions of responsibility in the city. It is true that Messrs. Buckingham and Follet are solicitors, but their business is not of a nature to oblige them to appear before the city Bench, and before appointing these gentlemen the Lord Chancellor obtained an assurance from both that neither of them, nor any member of their firm, would practise before the city magistrates so long as their names remained on the Commission of the Peace. There is no rule by which solicitors are excluded from the Bench in boroughs, but the Lord Chancellor's custom is not to appoint gentlemen of that profession if they are in the habit of practising before the Bench of the borough or city in which they carry on their business. It is not the practice, and it would be prejudicial to the public service, to lay on the table the papers connected with the information which the Lord Chancellor has to collect on the appointment of magistrates." (Cheers.)

SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

WE draw the attention of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society to the following facts. The office of Queen's proctor, formerly filled by a solicitor (the late Mr. Hart Dyke), has lately been handed over to the barrister of the Treasury. The post of solicitor to the War Office has just been abolished, and a "legal secretary to the Secretary of State for War" is substituted. At present this is but a change in title, as the learned solicitor (Mr. Clode) still remains at the War Office; but in the event of his death (which we hope may be as distant as nature will allow) it will be far more easy to appoint a barrister "legal secretary" than "solicitor" to the War Office, looking at the recent commendable action of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society on the subject, of conferring the offices of solicitors upon members of the Bar, notwithstanding the exclusiveness of the Bar in regard to the use of the Inns of Court, and their functions as advocates. But this is not all. We learn that the office of solicitor to the Admiralty is to be abolished, and that the duties are to be transferred to the Barrister of the Treasury. We hope that the latter report will turn out to be incorrect. If correct we have three public offices, which have been for at least half a century filled by solicitors, handed over to the Bar. It is time to protest against these acts of confiscation, and that loudly. What would the Bar say if the offices of Attorney-General and Solicitor-General were combined, and a solicitor appointed to fill the one office? We should never hear the end of it.

ABOUT the time that a certain M.P. (Sir E. Watkin) heard that two solicitors had recently been placed on the commission of the peace for the city of Exeter, we also heard of it. But it is painful to contemplate the very different views which we and the M.P. in question took of this proceeding on the part of the Lord Chancellor. We thought how fortunate it was that the Lord Chancellor should be so well advised as to appoint solicitors to the office of local magistrates. Better men cannot be found in the country to discharge the important duties of justices of the peace, for laymen are really not expected to have any opinion of their own on any legal question—the justices of Middlesex, to wit, in the Slade prosecution. Our experience is that local solicitors in such places as Exeter are frequently men of first-rate address and education, and mixing in the best society, men, in short, especially qualified to fill the office of local magistrate; and the present Lord Chancellor is no doubt of the same opinion, for he has so appointed very many country solicitors. But Sir E. Watkin evidently takes a different view. Tinkers and tailors may be appointed local magistrates, but—solicitors! What could the Lord Chancellor have been thinking about to appoint two solicitors magistrates for Exeter? says Sir Edward. Why, only fifty years ago solicitors were called "common attorneys." What, therefore, is the Lord Chancellor thinking about in making such appointments? The following occurred in the House of Commons on Tuesday last on this question. In reply to an inquiry by Sir Edward Watkin, as to whether two solicitors had been appointed magistrates for Exeter, and as to whether there was not "a rule" against such appointments, the Home Secretary read a letter from the Lord Chancellor on the subject, which stated in effect that Mr. Buckingham and Mr. Follet, two solicitors, had been appointed justices of the peace for the city of Exeter; but the Lord Chancellor before appointing them satisfied himself that their business did not require them to practise before the city bench, and they had given him an assurance that they would not do so, and that there was no "rule" against so appointing solicitors. We have no patience with such narrow and absurd views as those which influence men in Sir E. Watkin's position to ask such questions as the above. The larger the number of solicitors so appointed the better for the community at large, and the better will justice be administered in country districts. If solicitors were sought out for the special office of justice of the peace, we should read fewer pathetic articles in the Daily Telegraph about "Justices' justice," for solicitors are usually men of the world, neither influenced by sentiment on the one hand nor disregarding the weaknesses of human nature on the other. But who are the two solicitors appointed magistrates at Exeter with three other gentlemen, one at least of whom is a local merchant, no doubt fully deserving the honour conferred on him? One of the two solicitors in question has filled the office of Mayor of Exeter more than once, and as such chief magistrate has discharged the important functions of his office with marked ability. Mr. William Buckingham was admitted on the roll in Michaelmas Term 1840, and has never practised as an advocate; while Mr. Charles John Follett was admitted as recently as Easter Term 1864, having previously been a graduate of Oxford University for some years, and having while there taken his degree of Doctor of Civil Law. Both gentlemen are experienced conveyancers, and it is impossible to doubt but that Sir E. Watkin would not have troubled to ask the question he did in the House last Tuesday had he first taken the trouble to learn a little more about the especial qualifications of these two solicitors for promotion to the Bench. But we are happy to say that such appointments are not confined to borough magistrates, of whom hundreds throughout the country are solicitors. There are solicitors, especially in the South of England, who are county magistrates.

WE regret to have to announce the death of Thomas Starkie Shuttleworth, esq. for the county of Lancaster. T man, who has held the office for a period of nearly fifty years, was admitted on the rolls of the superior courts as long back as Hilary Term, 1825. The office which the deceased gentleman filled was one of great importance and responsibility, and the able manner in which he discharged his onerous duties for so long a period of time, is an argument in favour of extending to solicitors those more important legal offices throughout the country, which of late years the Bar have by their influence secured exclusively for themselves. The position of solicitors in this respect, however, is not improving, the office of Queen's proctor, which has been filled by solicitors for the last eighty years and more, has lately been handed over to the Solicitor to Her Majesty's Treasury, who, as is well known, is a member of the Bar. We may mention that the late Mr. Shuttleworth is succeeded in his practice by his son and partner, Mr. T. M. Shuttleworth.

THE Council of the Incorporated Law Society has asserted itself in a very emphatic manner. It has petitioned Parliament in favour of the following alterations in the University Bills, which are now before the House of Commons. The Council asks that the term of residence necessary in order to obtain a degree should be reduced to two years, that the length of the vacation should be shortened, or, in the alternative, that undergraduates who propose to take their degree in two years should be allowed to remain at college during a portion of the time at present assigned to vacations. These proposals are of a permissive rather than of a compulsory character, and we trust that they will receive the support of lawyers in the House. Legislators must look not less to the future than the present, and who can doubt the immense advantage which an university education would be to every solicitor. We unhesitatingly affirm that the functions of a solicitor are of such a character that no general education is too good for him. An university education is not everything to a man, but it is a great helpmate to the majority of men. So far as the Council of the Incorporated Law Society is concerned the proposals are strictly conservative, and in this sense should command the support of one side at all events of the Lower House. We venture to congratulate the council of the chief society of solicitors upon their action in this matter. It is one step in the direction of leaving the Inns of Court "out in the cold."

WE find that during 1876 there were only three prosecutions against unqualified persons under the Solicitors' Acts and the Stamp Act, as against twenty-seven successful prosecutions by Medical Practitioners' Societies under the Medical Act. Verbum sat sapienti. If solicitors will take the trouble to do as the medical men do, they will quickly rid themselves and their clients of a class of persons who delight to trade on professional usage and privileges, to the injury and discredit of the Profession. What is wanted is a little less noise and a little more action.

THERE is one clause in the Justices' Clerks Bill now passing through its several stages which is so objectionable that we should think the Incorporated Law Society will feel it necessary to move in the matter before it is too late. This clause (No. 5) is as follows:—"5. Every clerk appointed after the passing of this Act to be a salaried clerk of a petty sessional divisional, or to be clerk to the justices of a borough, shall either—(1) Be a solicitor to the Supreme Court of Judicature; or (2) Have served for not less than seven years as a clerk to a police or stipendiary magistrate, or to a metropolitan police court; or (3) Have served for not less than seven years as, or as assistant to, either a clerk of a petty sessional divisional, or a clerk to the justices of a borough, or (in the case of service before the passing of this Act) a clerk of special or petty sessions, or a clerk of a justice or justices of the peace." Surely every magistrate's clerk should be a solicitor or barrister. One thing is perfectly clear, however, that if the Government feels that a solicitor's clerk, who has acted for seven years as clerk to a magistrate's clerk, is thereby qualified to act as magistrate's clerk, it follows that they consider that a solicitor who has practised as an advocate for seven years is qualified to act as an advocate in the High Court of Justice.

WE have received from a solicitor practising in Wales an agreement for a lease bearing a lease stamp, and prepared by a land and estate agent, who charged two guineas for preparing it. Some of the provisions in this document we cannot make head or tail of, nor would anyone else be able to do so we are sure; it is, however, a lengthy document, it operates to lease extensive premises for ten years at a rental of £45 a year. The tenant, as is formed, objects to the landlord's condition of the clauses, and the landlord is disposed to turn round upon the land and estate agent, on the ground that he has not shown proper skill in preparing the agreement. We are asked if this agent is liable under any of the solicitors' Acts. There can be no doubt that he is not so. Nothing can be plainer than the terms of the second proviso to section 60 of the last Stamp Act (1870), the term "instrument" is not to include "agreement under hand only." The former Stamp Act required agreements for a lease for a term not exceeding seven years to bear a lease stamp, and by the present Act (sect. 96) an agreement for a lease for any term not exceeding 35 years (no limit as to rent) is to be charged with the same duty as a lease. What is the effect of this? Why, that the revenue being protected so far, solicitors need not expect any protection from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on this head. This provision operates as a direct premium upon accountants and agents preparing agreements for leases instead of solicitors being employed to prepare leases. There is, of course, this much to be said, that the mere fact of affixing a lease stamp to an agreement under hand does not make it a lease. Moreover a lease for a period exceeding three years must be by deed under seal. When, therefore, a landlord wishes to have all the advantages of a lease, when the tenancy is to extend over three years, a deed is necessary, and in the very case before us it is perfectly clear that had a deed been prepared the landlord would have been in a much better position than he is. The case of Hand v. Hall, referred to in our issue of the 24th ultimo, page 290, deserves attention in connection with this subject.

A SOLICITOR, in sending us the subjoined advertisement, which has regularly appeared in the Accrington Times says, "I shall be glad if you can advise me as to the best course to pursue in order to suppress it for the future." Here is the advertisement inviting people to get their legal work done at about half the usual costs:

JOHN BOOTHMAN, 8, Water-street, Accrington, begs to announce to tradesmen and others that he is prepared to Purchase or Collect Debts, to advance money on all kinds of Property, or on Household Furniture, or to purchase the same, giving nearly full value. Letters of Administration taken out, Wills made and proved, Apprenticeship Indentures made, and Agreements of all kinds prepared at about half the usual costs.

There ought to be some means of stopping such an advertisement, because the advertiser offers for fee and reward to do, at half the cost, work which only barristers and solicitors are permitted to undertake for fee and reward. There is not, however, any remedy unless and until it can be shown that the advertiser has done such work for fee and reward, and even then the machinery to be set in motion is of a very cumbrous character. For three consecutive sessions the Legal Practitioners' Society has striven without success to simplify the necessary procedure.

In another column we publish the annual report of the Manchester Incorporated Law Association for 1876, together with a short report of the meeting of this important country law society at which such report was adopted. Unusual pressure on our space prevented it appearing before. It will be seen that the report consists for the most part of a short review of the legislation of 1876, so far as it especially interests the legal Profession. There are, however, one or two other subjects considered in the report which deserve the attention of solicitors. We observe that the efforts of the Legal Practitioners' Society in procuring the passing of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 66 (not a very imposing Act of Parliament we are bound to say) seem to have been overlooked by the Manchester society, except that the report states, "The Incorporated Law Society are making efforts to procure the extension of this right (the right of solicitors to appear as proctors in the provincial courts) in the Diocesan Court of the Bishop of London." If the chief law society is not to be called on to make "greater efforts" than are necessary to procure this sequel to the Act of last session, we can only say that the members of its governing body will not be able to include over-work among the drawbacks to the responsibilities of office. This extension of the previous Act is already provided for in the Legal Practitioners' Bill of the present session, and will pass into law as a matter of course. The reference in the report to the office of the Manchester District Registrar of the High Court of Justice, calls for comment. The Profession will remember that when Mr. Edward Worthington, the former registrar, died, Mr. Walker, the registrar of the Southampton District Registry, was appointed to succeed him. This appointment, probably, took the Manchester society by surprise, and not without reason. The appointment (which we believe to be a thoroughly good one), was due in the main to the fact that the Lord Chancellor is of opinion that under sect. 60 of the Judicature Act 1873, the only persons eligible for the office of district registrar of the High Court, are County Court registrars, or registrars or prothonotaries of local courts, and we ought to add that in Mr. Walker's case the condition has been imposed upon him of giving up all private practice. We may therefore expect in future to see a system of promotion among County Court registrars pursued; and further, that the office of registrar of an important district registry will usually be conferred on a registrar of a County Court which constitutes one of the district registries of the High Court. County Court registrars will therefore in future have a chance of promotion before them—one of the incentives from which solicitors are, as a rule, entirely debarred. The danger is that some succeeding Lord Chancellor may take a different view of the meaning of sect. 60 of the Act of 1873, and that these appointments will be conferred on members of the Bar. Such a proposal must always be quickly and resolutely disavowed by solicitors. The Manchester solicitors (those who belong to the society that is) have expressed a very decided opinion against Lord Redesdale's views in regard to Parliamentary agency, which, however, will be yet adopted by the House of Commons unless solicitors bestir themselves a good deal more than they have done at present.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Tuesday, March 6.

(Before Mr. Commissioner KERR.)

JOSEPH JOHN ALLY JONES, a solicitor, was indicted for obtaining £2486 from Mrs. Sophia Frampton, with intent to defraud.

Wills, Q.C. and E. E. Cole, prosecuted.

Besley and Grain defended.

From the opening statement of counsel it appeared that between 1874 and 1876 the defendant induced the prosecutrix, a widow lady, of Regent-street, to enter into a co-partnership with himself and his father in a scheme for the purchase of the Basingstoke Canal for £12,000, of which she was to find £5000, and did sign a bill of exchange for that amount, which she gave him in fulfilment of her share of the agreement. The defendant's father was to contribute a similar amount, and the defendant himself £2000. Subsequently he got from the prosecutrix a blank piece of paper which she had signed, and which, later, when she insisted upon his returning it, she found to be a bill of exchange, and to have been filled in for £5000. In addition she had given him a bill of exchange for £2500, and an amount of £237, besides various sums for the repair of the canal. At this time he had entered into a contract to purchase the canal for £5000, but this contract was annulled, and it was not until the several items of money mentioned had been obtained that a second contract was entered into, whereby he arranged to fulfil the agreement, £4026 being substituted for the larger amount. Of the latter sum £210 only was paid, and this was contributed by the prosecutrix. They then found him taking the conveyance to his brother-in-law in November 1875, and in the following May he was a party to procuring an advance of £7000 upon the estate, and up to the present time the difference between the £210 paid, and the £4026 he had agreed to pay, had not been received by the vendor. Large sums were also obtained from the prosecutrix, as he said, to protect her interests in the canal and for other purposes, and eventually he induced her to become security for the repayment of a loan of £2000, so that now she had been compelled to seek refuge from her liabilities in the Bankruptcy Court.

Mrs. Frampton deposed generally to these facts, stating that she became acquainted with the defendant in 1866, and between that date and 1874 she advanced him several sums of money upon bills of exchange.

Cross-examined.—The defendant paid her 10 per cent. upon her advances. She considered this but an ordinary amount of interest. It was not true that the defendant represented the undertaking as a speculation or good opportunity of realising money.

A number of witnesses were examined, and it was proved that when the defendant's brother-in-law obtained an advance of £7000 upon the property, he made an affidavit that he was sole owner, and that it was unencumbered.

Besley, who called no witnesses for the defence, contended that the purchase of the canal was a mere speculation, and that the prosecutrix knew well the extreme risk she was incurring when she entered into partnership with the prisoner. Had his plan of forming a company been followed out a large profit would have resulted.

The jury convicted the prisoner, and

Mr. Commissioner KERR said that, considering the confidential position he (prisoner) occupied as the adviser of the prosecutrix, he could not pass a less sentence than five years' penal servitude.

at any subsequent examination. Six weeks' notice at least is necessary for these examinations, the same to be calculated up to the first day of the month of examination.

AN examination certificate is only available for admission on the roll of the Supreme Court within six months from its date, and must otherwise be specially enlarged by an order of the Master of the Rolls, which should be applied for at the Petty Bag Office.

THE number of candidates examined at the Final Examination last January was 192. Of these, 143 passed and forty-nine were postponed.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

LAST Tuesday, being the first meeting in the month of this society, motions were first disposed of, Mr. Rouse presiding. The question for the evening's debate was, "Can a married woman in all cases maintain an action in her own name for breach of contract, or for a tort in reference to her separate trade?" Mr. Reade opened the discussion for the affirmative, and Mr. Barber replied. After a short debate the question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Nicholls is appointed to open the debate next Tuesday evening on the question "Is the present condition of the English drama satisfactory?"

LIVERPOOL LAW STUDENTS' ASSOCIATION.

The fifth meeting this session was held on Monday, the 5th inst., at the Law Library, Cook-street, C. A. M. Lightboud, Esq., in the chair. The following was the subject for discussion: "Does the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in Metcalf v. Britannia Ironworks Company (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 796) with respect to the plaintiff's claim for freight pro rata itineris express the true state of the law upon the subject?"

Mr. Hull argued in the affirmative, and Mr. Melhuish in the negative, after which a discussion ensued. Mr. Hull having replied, the question was put to the meeting by the chairman, and decided in favour of the affirmative by two votes. There were twenty-three members present.

NOTTINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AN ordinary meeting of this society was held on Friday evening, 2nd March, in the grand jury room, Town Hall, S. G. Warner, Esq., in the chair. The question for discussion was one arising out of the following circumstances: "A. leases to B. for years. The lease contains a covenant that B. shall not assign without the licence of A. B. afterwards, without the licence of A., bequeaths the term by his will and dies." The question itself was, "That such a bequest is a forfeiture of the lease." Mr. S. G. Gilbert introduced the discussion, and was opposed by Mr. J. Woodhouse. The affirmative was supported by Messrs. Hodgson, Blake, C. L. Rothera, Woodward, Lake, and Barber, and the negative by Messrs. Buckby and A. J. Stevenson. Most of the members who spoke expressed their surprise that there should be no recently decided cases upon a point which must so very frequently arise in practice, and which is nevertheless uncertain. The chairman summed up, and the question, on being put to the vote, was decided in the negative by five votes to three. Several members abstained from voting. There were thirteen members present at the meeting.

SOUTHAMPTON LAW DEBATING SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this society was held at No. 6, Portland-street, on Thursday evening, 1st March, Mr. H. D. M. Page, solicitor, being in the chair. Mr. J. Daw, the registrar of the County Court, was elected an honorary member, and Mr. W. P. Pain an ordinary member. The question for debate was as follows: "If a tenant from year to year be actually on the premises at the time of the entry of the landlord on the expiration of a correct notice to quit, would the landlord be justified in assaulting and forcibly expelling him in order to regain possession of the premises?" Mr. A. W. Pearce opened in the affirmative, and was replied to by Mr. Lamport. Mr. Moseley also spoke in support of the negative. Mr. Pearce replied, and the chairman summed up, when, on the question being put to the vote, it was decided in the affirmative by a majority of one. Votes of thanks to Mr. Pearce and to the chairman closed the meeting.

UNITED LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AT the weekly meeting of this society, held at Clement's-inn Hall, Strand, on Wednesday, the 7th inst., the evening was occupied with various points of business. Among other things a committee was appointed to make the necessary arrangements for the "Davis prize" competition. Messrs. Henry T. Young, Grinham, Keen, and Benjamin G. Lake were elected vice-presidents of the society. We omitted to mention in our report of last week that the Leeds and the Newport Law Students' Societies were proposed to be added to the list of societies in union.

WOLVERHAMPTON LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

AT a meeting of this society held on Thursday, the 1st inst., C. B. Smith, Esq., in the chair, the following question was discussed: "A. is the owner of the leasehold interest in a house, and by a codicil to his will, after reciting the lease under which he holds, bequeaths the house and all his estate and interest therein unto and to the use of B. for all the residue of the said term of eighty years. A. subsequently purchases the freehold interest, and dies without having altered his will or codicil. Does B. take the freehold?" Mr. Clayton opened the debate in the affirmative, and was supported by Mr. Cresswell. Mr. Howe replied for the negative, and was supported by Messrs. Hall and A. B. Smith. The decision was in favour of the affirmative by the casting vote of the chairman. A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the proceedings.

COUNTY COURTS.

HEXHAM COUNTY COURT.

Jan. 12 and 13.

(Before T. BRADSHAW, Esq., Judge.)

RIDLEY v. HERDMAN.

Tithe rentcharge—Action to recover—Outgoing and incoming tenant.

THIS action was brought brought by the plaintiff, Christopher Ridley, farmer, of Marley Coat Walls Farm, in the parish of Slaley, against the defendant, Robert Herdman, farmer, Fern Hill, near Hexham, for the recovery of the sum of £20 17s. 3d., the amount of tithe rentcharge upon the Marley Coat Walls Farm, late in the occupation of the defendant, and due from him on the 1st Jan. 1876, to the Rev. Thomas Witham, and paid by plaintiff, the present occupier of the farm, on the 27th Oct. 1876, under ten days' notice from the said Rev. Thomas Witham, and to avoid proceedings for the recovery thereof, under the Tithe Commutation Acts.

Stevenson, barrister, instructed by S. J. Dak, solicitor, North Shields, appeared for plaintiff, and Wilfred Gibson, of the firm of Messrs. R. and W. Gibson, solicitors, Hexham, represented the defendant.

Stevenson, in his opening remarks, said the question which arose in this case was, whether the outgoing or the incoming tenant was liable to pay the tithe commutation rentcharge which became due next after the expiration of the tenancy. Although defendant's lease terminated on the 13th May 1875, yet this tithe rentcharge, becoming due on the first January following the expiration of his tenancy, was a charge which, by the custom of the country, the defendant was legally and equitably bound to pay. The defendant got the whole of the produce of the year, and had it not been for the commutation rentcharge the lay rector of the parish would have been entitled to collect from him tithes upon the whole of his crops. Tithes were originally due upon all crops, but they were subsequently commuted to corn tithes. The outgoing tenant got the away-going crop, and occupied the barn and stackyard until the 1st Jan., and upon that away-going crop he would be liable to pay the rector the amount of his tithe. It was agreed that this tithe had to be paid at the beginning of each year; of course that was on account of the past year's crop, and the custom was that the outgoing tenant paid the tithe commutation rentcharge. In the present instance the defendant, who is the outgoing tenant, had failed to pay his tithe according to custom, and the plaintiff, in order to avoid proceedings, had paid it to the rector on demand, and instituted this suit for its recovery from the defendant.

Joseph Snowball, of Seaton Burn House, commissioner to His Grace the Duke of Northumberland, said that the Rev. Thomas Witham was the tithe rentcharge owner in the parish of Slaley. The plaintiff, as incoming tenant, paid to his son, now agent to the Rev. Thomas Witham, in accordance with a formal demand made upon him, under ten days' notice, the sum of £20 17s. 3d., the amount of tithe rentcharge due upon the Marley Coat Walls Farm, of which he was then the occupier. Mr. Snowball stated that formerly he was agent for the Rev. T. Witham, and received the tithe rentcharge in the parish of Slaley. The Tithe Commutation Act came into force in 1836, and the tithes in the parish of Slaley were commuted in 1849. It was the custom that whoever was entitled to the away-going crop should pay the tithe due in respect of that crop on the following January succeeding his tenancy, except so far as the small tithes for lamb, wool, &c., were concerned. Mr. Snowball further stated, in respect to the custom of the country, as had been adopted by himself and other agents, as a tenant entered so he should quit; that was to say, if a tenant entered, as the defendant did, on the 13th May, 1863, his predecessor, the previous tenant, having paid the tithe rentcharge, due January, 1864, upon his away-going crop, £1 4s. having been allowed for the small tithe, and his tenancy terminated on the 13th May, 1875, he would have paid twelve years' rent to his landlord, and only eleven years' tithe rentcharge, clearly showing that he was liable as outgoing tenant to pay the tithe rentcharge, due January, 1876, for his away-going crop.

Gibson.—But suppose, by agreement with the landlord, the farm is laid down into grass by the outgoing tenant, and the incoming tenant gets the benefit of this grass crop, don't you think it fair that the person who gets the benefit of the crop should pay the tithe upon it?

Snowball.—This would not alter the tenant's liability to pay the corn tithe, it is an element in the rent between landlord and tenant. It seems quite clear to me (and in this I am borne out by the 4th section of the Act to improve the laws of landlord and tenant, dated 24th July 1851), if a tenant rents a farm for twelve years

The boy re-called, said he did not remember what money he gave or what change he received.

Mrs. Carwardine also could not tell, and said that the boy always paid for parcels out of his own money and then she repaid him.

Witness.—For the carriage of a parcel of the value of £25 the insurance is only 3d. in addition to the carriage; the ordinary price of Mrs. Carwardine's parcel was 6d., but it was charged 9d. because it was frail or fragile, and it would have been 1s. if it had been insured.

The witness observed that they were liable for goods under £10; according to the Railway Clearing House the company could refuse to send fragile parcels if the 50 per cent. over the carriage for frail parcels was not paid; many had been refused.

His HONOUR said he did not know before that a parcel of the value of £25 could be insured for the small sum of 3d.

Andrews said the boy had sworn that he had declared the value of the parcel, and the Act quoted in Godfrey was that if "the value or nature" was declared that the carriers were liable.

Matthews believed that the Act said "value and nature."

Thomas Potts recalled by his Honour.—I told Matthews that the parcel was worth £25; I did not tell him what it contained, as I did not know.

Mrs. Carwardine, in answer to his Honour, said she did not tell the boy what the parcel contained.

Matthews said that allowing that the value was declared, the nature was not; and he observed that in a case he was engaged in some days ago before Judge Whitbread when a lot of plate glass was sent by the company, in which it was admitted that the nature of the articles sent was declared but not the value, Judge Whitbread gave judgment for the company. In this case it was simply reversed, the value being declared but not the nature.

Andrews said that as quoted in Godfrey it was "or," and he handed the books to his Honour.

Some discussion arising as to what really was the right word in the Act, the statute was sent for, and his Honour observed that if the words as they were in his book, "and," he should not hold the company responsible. The statute being brought and perused, it was found that the words in the Act were "nature and value."

His HONOUR remarked that the section in the book handed to him by Mr. Andrews seemed to be very much abridged, and the word "or" had either been written in mistake or misprinted for "and." It had been made a hash of.

Evan Davies, the parcel porter at the station, who had been sent for at the request of his Honour, appeared, and said that he did not remember the parcel in question, and heard of it but a week after by a bother about it. Matthews did not give him the parcel; witness took the parcel out of a small box.

Andrews now contended that it was not necessary to declare the nature of the parcel, as the value declared must be the nature of the things contained in it.

His HONOUR, in delivering judgment, observed that relief was forced upon him by the words contained in the Act of Parliament, which said that the "nature and value" must be declared, and not only in this case did the boy say that the nature of the parcel was not declared, but Mrs. Carwardine said she did not tell him, therefore he could not do so. His Honour then said he had no alternative but to give judgment for the defendants. It was an unfortunate case for the plaintiff, seeming to be due to defective memory somewhere, and although he had seen many similar cases, he fully sympathised with her, and did not think the defendants would ask for costs.

Matthews: Certainly not.

In reply to Andrews,

His HONOUR said that his decision was entirely based upon the section of the Act of Parliament.

WANDSWORTH COUNTY COURT.

Tuesday, Feb. 13.

(Before H. J. STONOR, Esq., Judge.)

ANDRE V. COX.

Garnishee summons.

H. C. Weld (Dixon, Weld, and Co.) appeared for Mr. André, house agent, of Richmond.

Lyon appeared for Ambrose Haynes, solicitor, of Wandsworth.

It appeared that some time ago Mr. Cox, auctioneer, of Richmond, entered an action against Mr. André for malicious prosecution, but failed to substantiate his case, and had a verdict given against him with costs. Mr. Haynes was the solicitor for Mr. Cox in this action, and consequently also had a bill for costs against that gentleman. On the 20th Jan. Mr. Cox, in order to secure these costs to Mr. Haynes executed a deed of assignment to him of a chose in action, viz., a claim of £226 which he was then prosecuting in the Court of Exchequer against Mr. Hoskings, a builder of Richmond. On the 26th January a verdict in the Exchequer was given for Mr. Cox for £25. On the following day Mr. André was informed of the deed of assignment, and immediately garnished the defendant for the amount of his costs. Certain money had been paid into court, and Mr. Lyon now applied for that money to be paid to his client.

Mr. Ambrose Haynes was examined, and stated that he was solicitor for Mr. Cox in his action against Mr. André, but not in his action against Mr. Hoskings. Witness, in March last, took his two sons into partnership with him. His son Charles was acting for Mr. Cox in the suit of Cox v. Hoskings, commenced before the partnership. Witness had nothing to do with it, nor was it part of the partnership business.

Weld contended that the deed of assignment was invalid, as, though the action Cox v. Hoskings, was commenced by Mr. Charles Haynes, before the partnership, it was carried on by the partnership afterwards.

His HONOUR thought that was not the case. It was well-known that a partner could conduct business by himself, or in conjunction with his partner.

Weld then prayed that the deed should be set aside as fraudulent as against Mr. André, the attaching creditor, on the following grounds: First, that no notice of it had been given of it to his client for seven days; secondly, that the deed was a secret one; thirdly, that it was made pendente lite; fourthly, that it was made with a view to defeat a creditor; and, fifthly, that Mr. Haynes was solicitor for Mr. Cox in the action.

His HONOUR ruled that the deed was not fraudulent, and ordered the money to be paid to the applicant in a fortnight.

His HONOUR took a note of Mr. Weld's objections, at that gentleman's request, as he expressed an intention of appealing against the decision.

LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.

(Before J. F. COLLIER, Esq., Judge.)

Re BLACKBURN and PAWSON.

Bankruptcy—Practice—Trustee—Removal—Duty of—Right of new trustee—Rule 126.

THESE bankrupts carried on business as brewers in Mason-street, Liverpool, previously to and until the autumn of 1870, when, being pressed by several of their creditors, they placed their books into the hands of Mr. Peter Vine, accountant, of this town, in order to ascertain how they stood. As appears from affidavits, Mr. Vine, after auditing the books, informed the bankrupts that they were in a position to pay 25s. in the pound, but advised them to file a petition under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and thus obtain time to meet their engagements. They accordingly did so, and under such proceedings Mr. Vine was appointed receiver. Shortly afterwards the bankrupts were advised to file a declaration of their insolvency, and a petition in bankruptcy was filed against them, upon which they were adjudicated bankrupts, and Mr. Vine was again appointed receiver, and afterwards, at the first meeting of creditors, was appointed trustee. In the statement of affairs prepared by him the assets were estimated to produce £1432 0s. 6d. The business was carried on under the management of Mr. Vine until about June, 1871, and, as appeared by affidavits, had been worked at an estimated profit of £500. Notwithstanding the fact that the trustee had converted all the available assets into money, no dividend whatever had been paid, and Mr. Vine, according to his estate book, made it appear that the estate was indebted to him in about £150. Several of the creditors being dissatisfied, an application was made to the court, in Jan. 1876, for an order directing a general meeting of the creditors to be summoned to ascertain their wishes. The meeting was accordingly held before the registrar in Feb. 1876, when resolutions were duly passed by the statutory majority removing Mr. Vine from the trusteeship, and appointing Mr. Henry Bolland, of Liverpool, accountant, in his place. By rule 126, when a trustee is removed he is required to render an account in writing, to be filed with the proceedings, showing what he did while trustee, and also to account for all property of the bankrupts; and by rule 240 he is also required to deliver over all books, documents, papers, and accounts in his possession in any way relating to his office of trustee. Various applications were made by and on behalf of Mr. Bolland to Mr. Vine, requesting him to comply with the above rules. Mr. Vine had handed to Mr. Bolland various books and papers, together with his estate-book and a brief report, but had declined to render the required account, and also to hand over certain vouchers. In consequence of these defaults, on the 12th May, 1876, Mr. William Lowe, solicitor, applied to the court on behalf of Mr. Bolland, the trustee, in support of a motion to compel compliance with the said rules. Potter, barrister, instructed by Etty, represented Mr. Vine in opposition, and contended that as the estate book showed the transactions it was not necessary or incumbent upon the late trustee to furnish any other account, and that Mr. Vine had only retained certain vouchers showing payments by him which, the learned counsel contended, Mr. Vine was entitled to retain for his own protection. After hearing Lowe at some length, the learned judge stated that he was prepared to make the order, but, at the suggestion of Lowe, the motion was adjourned in order to afford Mr. Vine an opportunity of doing what was required. Ultimately, on the 11th August last, Mr. Vine being still in default, the learned judge made an order in the terms of the motion, and directed that Mr. Vine should pay the costs incidental thereto. On the 27th Jan. last, a general meeting of the creditors was held at the offices of Mr. Bolland, when a resolution was duly passed that the bankruptcy and the failure to pay 10s. in the pound, had, in their opinion, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupts could not be justly held responsible, and that they desired that an order of discharge should be granted to them.

The matter came before the court to-day, when William Lowe, on behalf of the bankrupts, applied for an order for their discharge, which was at once granted.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Tuesday, March 6.

(Before Mr. Registrar MURRAY.)

Re HIGGS.

Proof—Interest—Accrued since adjudication.

THE bankrupt, who was a cashier in the employment of the Great Central Gas Company, absconded some years since. The case was now brought before the court upon an application by the assignees to reduce a proof made against the estate by Mr. E. C. Nicholson, a gentleman residing at Herne Hill, by disallowing all charges for interest since the date of the bankruptcy; and the question involved was one of considerable importance to creditors holding security on the property of persons who become bankrupt.

Lucas and Douglas Kingsford appeared for the assignees.

Dauney for Mr. Nicholson.

The facts were briefly these: In Dec. 1868, the bankrupt mortgaged certain premises at Teddington to Mr. Nicholson, for the sum of £8000, subject to a proviso for redemption upon payment of that amount on the 13th Dec. 1871, with interest in the meantime at the rate of 5 per cent. Default having been made in payment of the principal money and interest, Mr. Nicholson, in pursuance of a power contained in the deed, proceeded to sell the property. He afterwards claimed to prove against the estate of Higgs (who had in the interval become a bankrupt), in respect of a deficiency of £1879 12s. 9d., being the balance of the sum of £8000, and interest accruing before and after the bankruptcy; and the question arose whether the mortgage was entitled to interest on the deficiency upon its security up to the time when the accounts were taken. On behalf of the assignees it was urged that the mortgagee was not entitled to interest accruing after the date of the bankruptcy.

Mr. Registrar MURRAY, in giving judgment, said in the case of Re Savin (L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 760), it was held that the rule in reference to the allowance of interest applied to secured as well as to unsecured creditors, and that a mortgage was not entitled to take into account interest subsequent to the bankruptcy. The same principle had been laid down by Lord Eldon in Re parte Badger (4 Ves. 165); and, although in the Court of Bankruptcy, a contrary practice had prevailed in regard to mortgagees' accounts, he thought, having regard to the authorities, that he was bound to disallow interest subsequent to the adjudication.

creditable, offering as they do law at half price, or "no cure no pay." Summonses are issued by hundreds to my knowledge in one society which I have in my mind, and which its solicitors have nothing to do with, nor do they generally have anything to do with them unless defended or unless default summonses are issued under sect. 1 of the recent County Court, when of course every practitioner knows why the particulars are signed by the solicitor. It is surprising me that solicitors will countenance unlicensed practitioners. It is grossly wrong to take societies and agents by the hand in County Court actions. Of course personal and selfish profit is at the root of it. The agents are the clients of the advocates and not the parties to the action. Every honourable member of the Profession who had true regard for his fellow members would and should scorn associations with unqualified practitioners, and it is a surprising thing to me that County Court Judges and advocates generally do not stand more upon their dignity. Well, Sir, it has occurred to me that if this new Bill when passed into law is to extend the powers of the vultures it requires the most serious consideration of the Profession. I think it is quite time a penal provision was made in plain terms enacting that no County Court action shall be commenced, nor any proceeding taken thereunder except by the plaintiff in person or his solicitor on his behalf. Where is the consistency of compelling gentlemen to qualify themselves for a position and to perform certain duties by passing those examinations at an enormous expense and tremendous wear and tear of mind, and paying for an annual certificate when the performance of those same duties can be assumed and undertaken by unqualified men, and without any fear of breach of etiquette by canvassing for employment by underrating lawyers and making any bargain they may think fit, without fear of being brought before the judges or struck off the rolls. Do not let it be supposed, Sir, that I undervalue the strict vigilance which is kept over the Profession, I admire it, but I complain that our interests are not sufficiently protected. I ask, Sir, why cannot this illegal traffic be put down? Why do not the Profession and in particular the Law Societies take up the matter, and say we will have it enacted that our annual licences which are enforced upon us shall be protected and respected equally with that of an auctioneer? Let every Law Society petition Parliament in support of a protective enactment in this Bill against invaders. FAIRPLAY. Leicester.

FINAL EXAMINATION AT LAW INSTITUTION.—Will you allow me to suggest that the Law Society or the Legal Practitioners' Society should ask some member of the Legislature to move that there should be added to the Bill for providing a new chancery judge a clause to the effect "that no master of the High Court of Justice shall hereafter be appointed or act as an examiner of articulated clerks to solicitors." This would be an easy way of getting rid of a great grievance. What will the new judge be styled? Baron, justice, and vice-chancellor appear to be abolished by the 5th section of the Judicature Act, which styles persons to be appointed "judges." March 5th. H. W. R.

ANSWERS.

(Q. 109.)—TESTACY AND INTESTACY.—PERSONAL ESTATE.—If "A. dies, having, by will, bequeathed certain property to B., but leaving other property, as to which his will is silent," it tends to reason that the gift to A. is a specific legacy, and that the debts must be paid out of the residue if it be large enough. ## LAW SOCIETIES.

MANCHESTER INCORPORATED LAW ASSOCIATION.

THE annual general meeting of the members of this association was recently held at the society's rooms, Cross-street Chambers, Manchester, when an account of the receipts and disbursements (previously audited by two of the members) was submitted and passed, and the officers and committee were elected for the ensuing year.

The proceedings of the society for the last year were stated in the following report, which was read by the Honorary Secretary (Samuel Unwin, Esq.), and unanimously adopted:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE FOR THE YEAR 1876.

Your committee have the satisfaction of submitting to the members the 38th annual report of the association.

The accounts of the treasurer for the last year bring forward a balance in hand of £132 1s. 11d. The amount invested in consols in trust for the association is £272 12s. 3d., on which there are dividends accumulated amounting to £146 15s. 2d. The committee have pleasure in recording a considerable accession of new members during the year.

Amongst the Acts which received the sanction of the Legislature during the session of 1876, the following possess special interest to the legal profession:

The Winter Assizes Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 57), enacted that where it is inexpedient to hold separate winter assizes for any county an Order in Council may provide for uniting such county, for the purpose of winter assizes, with any neighbouring county or counties, and for appointing the places at which winter assizes are to be held for such united counties, and for the necessary incidental charges. Under the provisions of this Act the criminal business of the counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland was transacted at Manchester at the winter assizes which have recently been held in this city.

The Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 59), came into operation on the 1st Nov. last. It preserves the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as the final court of appeal, and strengthens its constitution by providing for the appointment of four "lords of appeal in ordinary," two at the commencement of the Act, and two subsequently, on the reduction of the paid judges of the Privy Council. The new lords of appeal in ordinary have the rank of barons during life, and may sit and vote in the House of Lords during office.

The Act provides that the House of Lords may sit and hear appeals during any prorogation of Parliament, and even during a dissolution, if so authorised under the Royal Sign Manual.

The intermediate court of appeal is also strengthened by the transfer to it, from the common law divisions of the High Court of Justice, of three additional ordinary judges; but each of these three additional judges is under an obligation to go circuits. The vacancies in the common law divisions caused by this transfer are not to be filled up except upon an address from both Houses of Parliament, on the reduction of the paid judges of the Privy Council. The Act also provides for divisional courts and courts of appeal.

The 17th section enacts that from the 1st Dec. 1876, "every action and proceeding in the High Court of Justice, and all business arising out of the same, except as provided in the Act, shall, so far as is practicable and convenient, be heard, determined, and disposed of before a single judge," and all proceedings in an action subsequent to the hearing or trial shall, so far as is practicable and convenient, be had and taken before the judge before whom the trial or hearing took place. Sect. 22 empowers district registrars, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, to appoint deputies for a limited time.

The Legal Practitioners' Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 66), enables any certificated solicitor of the Supreme Court to appear as a proctor in the provincial courts of Canterbury and York. The Incorporated Law Society are making efforts to procure the extension of this right in the Diocesan Court of the Bishop of London.

Acts have also been passed to facilitate the giving in evidence of entries in bankers' books, without the necessity for removing the books from the bank (39 & 40 Vict. c. 43), to amend the law with respect to crossed cheques (39 & 40 Vict. c. 81), to amend the Partition Acts (39 & 40 Vict. c. 17), and as to the Regulation and Inclosure of Commons (39 & 40 Vict. c. 56).

Clerk of the Peace (County Palatine of Lancaster) Act Amendment Act (39 & 40 Vict. c. iv., local and personal). This Bill was again introduced by the promoters, at an early period of the session, and every exertion was made to hurry it through Parliament; petitions against the Bill were presented by the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool and by your Association, and Mr. William Rathbone, M.P., again carried himself to the utmost in opposing the Bill, first on the second reading, and afterwards in committee, where he proposed amendments to the effect that each deputy clerk should be a solicitor of ten years' standing, and should have an office within his district, and that the clerk of the peace should have no interest in the emolument of any deputy. The only amendment effected in committee was a provision that the deputy clerks should be solicitors of seven years' standing, and after an unsuccessful attempt to obtain further amendments on the report, the Bill, in consequence of the support given to it by the Government, passed the Commons in that form.

Your committee, in conjunction with the Liverpool Law Society, continued their opposition in the House of Lords, where they again petitioned against it, and joined the Liverpool Law Society in circulating amongst the Peers a statement of reasons against the Bill. Owing to the support of the Government the Bill eventually passed the House of Lords, upon which your committee, in conjunction with the Liverpool society, addressed a joint letter to the Earl of Selkirk (the Lord Lieutenant of the county), with whom the appointment of the clerk of the peace would practically rest, requesting him to make such conditions as would ensure the appointment of deputy clerks resident, and having a local office in their own districts, and being adequately paid, and peculiarly independent of the clerk of the peace. His Lordship has since promised that when a vacancy occurs in the office of clerk of the peace he will not make any appointment without further hearing both sides.

Chancery of Lancashire—New Rules and Orders.—The Vice-Chancellor of Lancashire kindly promised during the previous year that the draft rules and orders by which it was proposed to introduce the procedure under the Judicature Acts into the Palatine Court of Chancery should be laid before the law societies of Lancashire for consideration before being settled. In the course of the summer the draft of the proposed rules was accordingly forwarded by the Vice-Chancellor and considered by your committee, who approved generally of the rules as prepared, and forwarded to the Vice-Chancellor some suggestions which were most courteously received and adopted. The new rules and orders (including orders as to court fees and solicitors' costs) have since been signed and issued, and came into operation on the 1st Jan. 1877.

Office of District Registrar at Manchester.—A vacancy in the office of District Registrar, at Manchester, of the High Court of Justice, having occurred in consequence of the death of Mr. Edward Worthington, your committee adopted the following resolutions:—That in the opinion of the committee of this association the office of district registrar of the High Court of Justice for the Manchester district, involves duties of a very important character, that the salary ought to be of such amount as will secure the services of a thoroughly competent man, and that the district registrar should be required to devote himself to the duties of the office exclusively.

That in the judgment of this committee the qualifications for the office are such as are usually possessed by a solicitor who has had large experience in the practice of the courts, and that this committee respectfully submit to the Lord Chancellor that in their opinion it is desirable to select the district registrar from among gentlemen of that branch of the Profession, and the committee will be prepared, if the Lord Chancellor approve, to name candidates from among the solicitors who would, in their opinion, be well qualified to discharge the duties of the office.

A copy of these resolutions was forwarded to the Lord Chancellor, with an intimation that a deputation would, if his lordship desired, wait upon him, to further explain the views of the association. Your committee having ascertained that the Lord Chancellor was of opinion, that under the 65th section of the Judicature Act 1873, the only persons eligible for the office of district registrars of the High Court are County Court registrars, or registrars or prothonotaries of local courts, your committee again addressed his lordship on the subject, when they were informed that Mr. Henry John Walker, solicitor, registrar of the County Court at Southampton, would be appointed to the office, by order in council, in pursuance of the provisions of section 60 of the Judicature Act 1873, and that the whole of his time would be devoted to the performance of the duties of his office. The appointment has since been made and Mr. Walker has entered on the duties of the office.

Stamp Office Arrangements for Legacy and Succession Accounts.—The attention of your committee having been drawn to the generally unsatisfactory arrangements for the payment of legacy and succession duties, they prepared and forwarded a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury requesting the appointment, at Manchester, of an officer competent to answer inquiries, examine accounts, and to deal with questions of legacy and succession duties generally. In reply to the memorial, their lordships informed your committee that they were advised that a thorough examination of legacy and succession duty accounts is impossible elsewhere than at the Inland Revenue Office in London, where the registers are kept. Their lordships were, however, informed that the commissioners of Inland Revenue had given instructions to their officers at Manchester, to give to those who have to render such accounts every assistance in their power.

Parliamentary Agency.—Towards the close of the parliamentary session a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament was appointed to consider the regulations admission and practice of parliamentary agents. The proceedings of the committee having led to the expectation that the committee would recommend separation of parliamentary agents from the law, and its constitution as a distinct body, of which the members need not be lawyers, prohibition of any division of profits between agents and solicitors, on the usual principles, your committee passed the following resolution:—"That in the opinion of this association it is advisable to attempt to impose any restrictions on the practice of parliamentary agents dividing their time with the country solicitors who instruct them, such prohibition would not lessen the present parliamentary proceedings."

It is advisable to confine the appointment of parliamentary agents to solicitors of the Supreme Court. The joint committee, when issued, stifled the fears entertained with regard to it, on from your association in conjunction with the Liverpool, Leeds, and Wakefield societies, and accompanied by some members of it and several parliamentary agents, waited on Mr. Raikes, the chairman of committees of the House of Commons, when the views of the several societies were forcibly presented to him. The Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom petitioned the report, and great exertions were obtained a postponement.

standing the representations made, Lord St. Aldrich pressed the proposed regulations on the Lords, and though the Lord Chancellor decried their hasty adoption, the Lords eventually passed the report. Your committee then directed attention to a resolution in the House of Commons, which addressed the Home Secretary, the General, and various other members, and in which the regulations came before the Committee. After an hour and a half of discussion, the Committee resolved not to deal with the matter that day. This result was, no doubt, owing to the action of the various law societies, but it can only be a postponement of the question, and the subject renewed next session, when further efforts will be needed to prevent the adoption of the report.

It seeking to undervalue the importance of an agent with parliamentary practice and rules of the committee consider that knowledge of the law by far the more important qualification in a Parliamentary Agent, and the Lord Chancellor himself that the special knowledge necessary to the passage of private bills through Parliament acquired in a few weeks, or even days, is of creating a limited close body of Parliamentary Agents (resembling the old Proctors in the old Courts), seems to have been altogether in the report of the joint committee, and is entirely opposed to the ideas of the present gession that by a division of profits between Parliamentary Agent and solicitor the expense of Parliamentary proceedings is increased, is known by conversant with the facts to be a complete misstatement of the universal practice of division between the agents and country solicitors in other legal proceedings. The materials for a bill in Parliament are, and must of necessity be, obtained and by a solicitor, and then put in shape by the Parliamentary agent.

vision between the parliamentary agent and of the remuneration lessens the charges which he has to make against his own client.

committee suggest that their successors should so and similar views in opposition to the which it is anticipated will be made in the session to get the report alluded to adopted by the House of Commons.

ed Provincial Law Societies.—A general meeting of members of this association was held in March, at which your association was represented by Mr. Bateson Wood and the Honorary (Mr. Unwin), a number of suggested amendments to the rules and orders under the Judicature Act, as to district registries, were discussed; and resolutions then adopted a memorial was presented to the Lord Chancellor, which induced him to embody some of the suggestions in the new Bill. On the subject of Professional Regulation, the following resolution was adopted:—"That this association approves, generally, of the scale of charges proposed by the committee of the Incorporated Law Society, and hopes the Council will adopt such scale."

respect to conditions in fire policies, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That in this meeting the condition lately inserted in fire insurance, that in case the property, the fire insurance, is insured by the insurer, or by person whomsoever, the office shall only be pay a proportionate part of the loss, is unjust and unfair, and that the attention of the Incorporated Law Society, and of the Law Societies, be called to this subject."

dition referred to, which is found in all policies of insurance belonging to the Association of Insurance Offices, has only been inserted during the last few years. It prejudicially affects mortgagees insuring property for their security. The loan to be put on the clause is, at present, in a cause likely to be soon heard, on appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, in The North and Mercantile Insurance Company v. The Liverpool and Globe Insurance Company and others. Your committee have passed a resolution on the subject to that of the Associated Provincial Law Society, and at present content themselves with calling attention of the members of the association to the Practice.—(Preparation of assignment or sub-sale of leasehold property for pecuniary consideration and a chief rent). The following is a copy of a resolution submitted to the committee, and of their decision thereon:—"That in the point:—To be a plot of land, and houses erected thereon, the sum of £500 and a chief rent of £10 to be paid by the tenant."

The property is leasehold for 999 years.

Whose solicitor is entitled to prepare the assignment, or sub-demise, and duplicate, in the absence of any special agreement?"

Resolved:—"That this committee, while recognising the rule that in the absence of any special agreement a lessor's solicitor is entitled to prepare lease and counterpart, at the lessee's expense, consider that in the case submitted, which is in effect a sale, the purchaser is entitled to have the transfer of the property prepared by his own solicitor, whether it be taken by assignment or sub-demise. The committee consider this to be in accordance with the principle laid down by their predecessors, in 1846, relative to chief rent conveyances, where there is also a money consideration. The purchaser should, in the opinion of the committee, furnish at his own expense, a duplicate or counterpart to the seller."

Provincial Meeting of the Incorporated Law Society.—This meeting was held at Oxford, on the 4th and 5th Oct., when your association was represented, not only by the customary deputation, but by the attendance of several other members. The meeting, which was a most interesting and successful one, was attended by about 140 solicitors. After the address of the president (Mr. H. T. Young, of London), several valuable papers were read and discussed, and resolutions passed on the subjects of "Parliamentary Agency," and "University Education for Solicitors."

The Vice-Chancellor, who had placed the University Buildings at the disposal of the society, courteously received the members, and extended his hospitality to the presidents of some of the law societies, including your own. The members dined together in the Hall of Christ Church College on the evening of the 4th Oct., and were entertained on the following evening at a dinner given at the University Museum, by the committee of Oxford solicitors by whom the arrangements for the meeting were made; while on the day following the meetings a large party visited Blenheim Palace, where they were received, and entertained at luncheon by the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough. The place of the next provincial meeting will be fixed by the council of the Incorporated Law Society.

THE LATE MR. COBBETT, M.P.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a short notice of the late Mr. Cobbett, M.P., which appears in your impression of the 3rd inst., and in which Mr. Cobbett is stated to have been "a persistent agitator in the Tichborne case," &c. You are mistaken in attributing the Tichborne agitation to the late Mr. Cobbett, and have confounded him with his brother, Mr. William Cobbett, who, to the great annoyance of his late brother, was in the habit of making applications to the different courts of justice, and of late on the subject of the Tichborne case. As an intimate friend of one of the executors of the late Mr. Cobbett, M.P., I, at the request of his widow and children, beg that in your next impression you will rectify the mistake which has been made, and oblige yours faithfully,

FREDERICK SALTER, Q.C.

MR. COMMISSIONER SANDERS.

THE late George Williams Sanders, Esq., of Weybridge, Surrey, formerly Commissioner in the Court of Bankruptcy, who died at Plymouth, on the 15th Feb., in the eighty-first year of his age, was the eldest son of the late Francis Williams Sanders, Esq., of Weybridge, one of the most eminent conveyancers of his day; his mother was Anne, daughter of the late Thomas Griffith, Esq., and he was born in London in the year 1796. Educated at Westminster, and at University College, Oxford, he chose the law as a profession, and was entered as a pupil under Mr. Pemberton (afterwards Lord Kingsdown), who mentions him as being his first pupil. He was called to the Chancery Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1820, and in 1836 was made chief secretary at the Rolls by Lord Langdale, a post which he held for fifteen years. In 1851 Lord Langdale retired from the Rolls, and shortly afterwards died, without having made any provision whatever for his chief secretary; and Mr. Sanders, then at the age of fifty-five, with a very large family, and his private practice at the Bar all gone, was reduced to begin life over again. His case excited great commiseration among the Profession; and the first to come to his help was the Lord Justice, Sir George Turner, who appointed him his secretary. He was also secretary to the Landed Property Commission during the time it lasted. In 1853 he was raised to the Bench as a Commissioner of Bankruptcy, by Lord Chancellor Chelmsford, who had just in that year received the Seals, and who appointed him to the Birmingham and Nottingham Courts; over these courts he continued to preside till the passing of the new Bankruptcy Act, by which the country commissionerships were abolished. Mr. Sanders' judgments were seldom appealed against, and still more rarely reversed, though the business done in his court was very great, and many of the cases decided by him involved important interests. Indeed, it is affirmed, that the dignity of the Birmingham Court was thoroughly upheld while Commissioner Sanders ruled there. The manner of the presiding judge, acquired by long association with the highest tribunals of justice, prevented any approach to the scenes that at one time gained for the Court of Bankruptcy an unenviable name. Mr. Sanders was master of the law which he sat to administer, and he soon showed that nothing like disrespect to it or himself would be tolerated or overlooked. During the eleven years that he sat in Birmingham he had but one occasion to act severely; and he retired when the new law came into force, on the 1st Jan. 1870, with the increased respect and good wishes of all. Mr. Sanders married in 1821, Frances Georgiana, eldest daughter of Thomas Griffith, Esq., of Ham, Surrey, and by her, who died in 1864, he has left a family of six surviving children, two sons and four daughters. The remains of the deceased gentleman were interred at Plymouth.

F. J. BRAIKENRIDGE, ESQ.

THE late Francis Jerdone Braikenridge, Esq., solicitor, of Bartlett's-buildings, Holborn, who died, on the 27th ult., at his residence, Bush Hill, Edmonton, Middlesex, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, was the eldest surviving son of the late William Braikenridge, Esq., of Bartlett's-buildings, and was born in the year 1823. He was admitted a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1847, and was a Commissioner in the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION—NOTICE.

THE Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors have given directions that motions for judgment in actions shall not be brought on as ordinary motions, but shall be set down in the Cause Book.

They can be marked short, on production of the usual certificate of counsel, and will then be placed in the paper on the first short cause day after the day for which notice is given. If not marked short, they will come into the general paper in their regular turn.

It will be advisable that the notices of motion for judgment should, if it is intended to mark them short, contain a statement to that effect, and also a statement that no further notice will be given of their having been so marked. Such statement will dispense with the necessity for giving defendants further notice that motions for judgment have been marked short.

Where a defendant makes his defence, and the plaintiff moves under Order XL., r. 11, for such order as he is entitled to on the admissions of the defendant, the action need not be set down; but if, on the motion being made, it appears that there must be a discussion or argument, it may be ordered to go into the general paper, subject to any order for its being advanced.

The attention of solicitors is also called to the provisions in the Judicature Rules as to notices of trial; as notice of trial can only be given after pleadings closed, the proper course, where the are no pleadings, is to set the action down on motion for judgment under Order XL, r. 1.

R. H. LEACH, Senior Registrar.
Chancery Registrars' Office, Dec. 1876.

TRIALS BEFORE A JUDGE AND JURY IN CHANCERY ACTIONS.—NOTICE.

In actions assigned to the Chancery Division, when the Plaintiff under Order XXXVI, rule 3, of the rules of the Supreme Court gives notice of trial before a judge and jury, the action is to be entered for trial with the associates instead of with the Chancery registrar.

Where, after the plaintiff has given notice of trial in any other manner, and has set down the action in the Chancery Division, the defendant has, under the provisions of the same rule, given notice he desires to have the issues of fact tried before a judge and jury, the action will be marked in the cause book "jury trial at defendant's instance" on the request of the solicitor for either party, and on the certificate of such solicitor, that such notice has been duly given within the time, or extended time, referred to in rule 3.

Actions which have been so marked will be added by the associates to their list of Actions for trial, upon the solicitor for either party bringing to them the certificate of the Chancery registrar in form given below, annexed to the statement of claim. Such actions will be placed in the list in the order in which they are entered with the associates.

R. H. LEACH,
Senior Registrar.

Chancery Registrars' Office,
Feb. 1877.

[Reference to Record, and Short Title].

SUMMARY OF QUINQUENNIAL REPORT,

FOR THE PERIOD ENDING 31st DECEMBER, 1876.

In valuing the business of the Company for the period ending 1871, the Carlisle Table of Mortality, with 3 per cent. interest, was adopted for both Branches. Since that time the Institute of Actuaries has published the result of its investigations into the mortality existing among assured lives, and the directors, desirous to obtain the latest experience on the subject, had no hesitation whatever in deciding to adopt the result of such experience for the valuation of the Ordinary Branch.

The only question requiring any serious consideration on their part was the rate of interest which should be assumed in the calculations, and after mature deliberation on the subject, the Directors resolved to adhere to the rate used on the previous occasion, viz., 3 per cent., and they therefore instructed the Actuary of the Ordinary Branch to value his policies by the Institute H<sub>3</sub> 3 per cent. Table, and with pure premiums only.

The effect of the adoption of these principles will be to increase the amount required to be held in reserve to a very considerable extent.

In the Industrial Branch the Directors have for some years recorded their own mortality experience, but they hesitated to use this until the results shall have been confirmed by still further experience, and they thought it inadvisable to adopt a table of mortality which had not been made public.

The various published Tables of Mortality were compared with the Prudential experience, and finding that Dr. Farr's English Life Table (No. 3) very closely approximated to their own experience, they preferred using it for the present valuation; and they were further induced to adopt this table from the fact that the results were deduced from the mortality of the population at large.

The instructions to the Actuary of the Industrial Branch were, therefore, to value by the English Life Table (No. 3), with 3 per cent. interest.

The Directors have had under consideration the anomalous results which would be produced by classifying the ages in the Industrial Branch according to the usual methods; and it was therefore resolved to adopt a different system, keeping the policies issued in each year distinct, and making a separate valuation for each year of issue.

They further instructed the Actuary to make separate valuations for male and female lives, and, as the first policies were issued by the Company in the year 1852, this involved the enormous labour of fifty separate valuations. He was also instructed, not merely to exclude negative values, but to provide a positive liability for every single policy in force. This has been done.

The reports of the Actuaries show that while the Assurance Fund on 31st December, 1876, amounts to ... £869,259

The Reserves required are—

Ordinary Branch ... ..	£404,835
Industrial Branch ... ..	356,736
	<hr/> £761,571

Showing a surplus of ... .. £107,688

The Directors have submitted the reports of their Actuaries to Mr. A. H. Bailey, to whose important report they beg to draw special attention.

During the five years the premium income of the Company has increased from £348,975 15s. 6d. to £1,063,821 14s. 4d., showing an increase of £714,845 18s. 10d.

The Assurance Fund, notwithstanding the charges incurred for extension expenses, has been increased from £354,438 13s. 1d. to £868,401 5s. 4d., showing an increase of £513,962 12s. 3d.

It may be interesting to the Share and Policyholders to be informed that the Valuation of the Business of the Company has been completed in six weeks from the time of closing the books on 31st December, 1876, and when it is borne in mind that the number of contracts in the Ordinary Branch was 17,912, and in the Industrial Branch 2,643,665, the operation is one totally unexampled in the history of Life Assurance, and testifies in an unmistakable manner to the efficiency of the staff of the Company.

In conclusion, the Directors again congratulate the various connections of the Company upon its present satisfactory condition, and assure them that the very cautious principles which have hitherto guided them will continue to animate them in the future, and they rely on the cordial co-operation of every one interested in its welfare to help to advance the Company to a still greater position of prosperity.

TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY.

GENTLEMEN,—

The Quinquennial Valuation of the liabilities of your Company, to the 31st December, 1876, a work far surpassing in magnitude any similar operation in the history of Life Assurance in this country, has been completed. During the progress of the work, I have from time to time inspected the various operations, and have now had submitted to me the results.

The business of the Company is divided into two branches, called the "Ordinary" and the "Industrial." These are henceforth, in pursuance of powers which have been obtained for that purpose, to be worked independently of each other, separate accounts being kept for each.

The total premium income of the Policies in force on the 31st December, 1876, was £1,063,821 per annum.

Of this, £83,245 belongs to the Ordinary, £980,576 to the Industrial Branch.

Of the former premiums, about 62 per cent. are payable annually, the remainder half-yearly, quarterly, and in a few cases monthly. The whole of the premiums of the Industrial Branch are payable weekly.

The liabilities of the Ordinary Branch have been estimated, as explained in Mr. Hughes' Report, the Assurances by what is technically termed an H<sub>3</sub> 3 per Cent. Pure Premium Valuation, the Annuities by the Government Experience, also at 3 per cent. interest. It will suffice to say that the effect of these processes is to subject the liabilities to a very stringent test, which I believe that the greater number of ordinary Life Assurance Companies could not bear.

In the Industrial Branch, the average amount assured by each Policy is £8 8s. 9d., and the average weekly premium rather less than 1½d.; the average rate of premium is £4 7s. 11d. per cent. per annum on the sum assured. Of the total premiums, 83 per cent. are payable on Policies that have been issued during the last five years; and of the remaining 17 per cent., more than one-fourth are for assurance on lives not exceeding 15 years of age.

In acquiring and carrying on such a business as this, heavy expense must necessarily be incurred. The cost of acquiring the business is met by the condition of the Policy stipulating that less than the full sum assured shall be payable if death occur during the first year of assurance; thus reviving in another form the practice of requiring an entrance fee. The cost of conducting the business is met by charging materially higher rates of premium than in the Ordinary Branch. Again, it is found by experience that many of these Policies are allowed to lapse after short periods; thus, of the Policies that were existing at the date of the last valuation, five years ago, about 58 per cent. only are now in force.

Attention is drawn to these peculiarities to show why the methods of valuation in common use, and which alone were contemplated by the Life Assurance Companies Act, are in my judgment not applicable to, and should not have been required for, such a business as this. thing for invitations to be held out by the clerks of leaders on circuit to dispense with juniors. This is a mischievous practice, calculated to act injuriously upon the interests of the Bar.

VICE-CHANCELLOR HALL has been called upon to teach district registrars the limits of their jurisdiction. It appears that in matters in the Chancery Division the registrars have been assuming to appoint receivers, and to direct banking accounts to be opened and money to be paid in. The VICE-CHANCELLOR says that all such proceedings are irregular, and that money paid into such accounts and paid out will be so dealt with at the risk of everybody concerned, including the registrars. Some registrars have evidently been fondly imagining themselves to be Judges of the High Court.
